Esmond Butler

The Speaker of the Senate,

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

At 3 p.m. His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate Chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and, that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Second Session of the Thirty-Second Parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the Second Session of the 32nd Parliament of Canada.

Canadians had the great pleasure of welcoming their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales on an extended tour in June and July of this year. All who saw them were impressed by their friendly, out-going manner and their youthful dignity. As well, since April 1980, we have had the pleasant duty of hosting and meeting with fourteen foreign Heads of State visiting Canada.

We join fellow Canadians in looking forward to the scheduled visit to Canada in 1984 of Her Majesty, the Queen, and His Royal Highness, the Duke of Edinburgh, who will tour the provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick and Manitoba.

You recently completed an historic session of Parliament. The Constitution was brought home and with it came the final attainment of full Canadian sovereignty. The entrenchment of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms will forever help protect the liberty of our citizens. The vital energy and transportation industries are being transformed by the passage of the National Energy Program and the Western Grain Transportation Act. A co-operative national campaign to cut the rate of inflation in half was initiated through the 6 and 5 program. Members and Honourable Senators present all played an active part in these momentous events.

We meet today in a perilous time. East-West tensions are rising. Violence stalks many lands. The resort to force is a daily occurrence. The nuclear threat preys upon the hopes and dreams of every man and woman on the planet. The pursuit of peace must be the paramount goal of mankind. In this quest we must not fail.

For the past several years Canadians, indeed all people, have coped not only with the melancholy of the nuclear threat, but with the reality of the worst recession since the 1930s. This recession, which left more than thirty million people unemployed in the industrialized nations alone, is fortunately ending. Unemployment in all countries will remain too high for too long. But Canada has dramatically reduced the inflation which was the origin of this downturn. Our regained strength, combined with the proper mix of public policies, can now return the country to economic health and move us to new achievements.

So we must work for two goals central to the well-being of Canadians—to secure peace and to secure prosperity.

Abroad, the Government has begun the task of helping to construct a global partnership for peace.

At home, the Government's efforts will be directed to building a national partnership for prosperity.

To attain these goals, a comprehensive program will be presented:

- to seek fresh approaches to world peace;
- to encourage economic growth so that more Canadians can own a home, learn a trade, expand a business, participate in the ownership of our resources and gain a fair share of the abundant benefits this country can provide;
- to develop new partnerships among business, labour, government and other groups so that together we will build a better future;
- to preserve Medicare, increase pensions for the elderly, improve public safety, extend native rights, and further protect the freedom of individuals; and
- to reinforce Canada's identity through enhanced recognition of our cultural heritage and increased support for our creative artists by new broadcasting, telecommunications and copyright policies.

I. Canada's Role in Seeking World Peace

Thirty-five million people have been killed in wars since 1945, and the possibility of a major conflict is a danger no nation can ignore. In the four decades since the Second World War, Canada and its allies have sought to preserve peace through substantial contributions to Western collective defence and sustained efforts to resolve differences with our adversaries. Yet the current international situation is cause for considerable concern, even anguish.

The Government, in close consultation with our allies, intends to devote its full resources to exploration of every possible means to restore confidence and trust to the international scene. It will continue to advance proposals to slow the steady spiral of the arms race, halt the spread of nuclear weapons and create the conditions for greater security at lower levels of armament.

Canada will continue to make a responsible contribution to collective defence, in fulfillment of its obligations to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the North American Air Defence Command. The Government will maintain its commitment to 3 percent real growth annually in defence expenditure, thus ensuring that our forces are equipped with modern conventional weapons. Canadian forces will not be armed with nuclear weapons. Announcements will be made regarding conventional weapons procurement programs.

Renewed attention, too, will be given to the contribution Canada can make to peace and stability through peacekeeping operations under the control of the United Nations, particularly where local crises risk escalation into wider conflict.

Improving the climate among nations requires knowledge, creativity and a determination to find solutions. Reflecting Canada's concern about current international tensions, the Government will create a publicly funded centre to gather, collate and digest the enormous volume of information now available on defence and arms control issues. Fresh ideas and new proposals, regardless of source, will be studied and promoted.

Canadians want more than ever to become personally involved in the quest for peace. The Government will increase its funding for voluntary associations and private research groups interested in security, arms control and disarmament issues. Resources for research and development of verification procedures, the basis of successful arms control agreements, will be expanded substantially.

Economic progress is a crucial contributor to peace and stability. Recognizing the urgent needs of developing countries, the Government will maintain its commitment to overseas development aid. Canada will achieve aid goals of 0.5 percent of the Gross National Product by 1985, and 0.7 percent of the GNP by the end of this decade. Increased involvement of voluntary organizations and the co-operative movement will be sought in the delivery of this aid. Particular attention will continue to be given to the growing world food crisis, through existing programs, and the new International Centre for Ocean Development.

II. Opportunities through Growth

Lasting employment for all Canadians wanting work is a critical national objective. Since last December, 353,000 new jobs have been created by the economy. Through the injection of close to $5 billion in stimulus, the April 1983 Recovery Budget set in motion hundreds of needed capital projects across Canada, and helped make possible a return to much higher rates of private sector investment.

But even with a strong recovery, the Government believes direct action to create jobs continues to be essential. And young people are the priority.

Therefore, a larger portion of the Government's job creation expenditures will be devoted to unemployed youth and these programs will be delivered more effectively. Using re-allocated and new resources, a $1 billion Youth Opportunity Fund will assist young Canadians in acquiring new skills and in finding jobs in the private, voluntary and public sectors. In particular, substantial resources from this Fund will be allotted to a career access program which encourages the private sector to provide work and training to those entering the workforce for the first time. To intensify the Government's efforts for young Canadians, a Minister of State for Youth will be appointed.

While young people will receive special attention, the employment strategy of the Government will touch every group in society. Additional funds for this winter will be allocated to the Canada Works Program. Job opportunities in forestry, mining and the fishery will be enhanced through flexible uses of Unemployment Insurance funds.

Two new programs will be introduced. Canada's massive, diverse and vital voluntary sector will receive incentives to hire Canadians through a National Voluntary Service. A conservation corps—Environment 2000—will be created to employ Canadians to carry out essential tasks in reforestation and national park development.

Developing our Regional Strengths

Direct action to create jobs is essential. But the major opportunity for increasing employment is through the expansion of our industrial and resource sectors. We must reconstruct the basis for long-term economic growth and seize the opportunities provided by the recovery.

We must start by building on our regional strengths.

To ensure a strong national economy capable of providing jobs and meeting the needs of all Canadians, wherever they may live, federal programs and funding have already been re-organized in a new Industrial and Regional Development Program. It will support recovery through concrete initiatives, taking maximum advantage of the strengths and attributes of every region.

A new era of federal-provincial planning and consultation is being launched. Federal economic development activities will more effectively support regional economic opportunities and the reduction of regional disparities. To this end, negotiations are underway to sign comprehensive Economic and Regional Development Agreements with the provinces. These agreements will include such key sectors as agriculture, forestry, minerals, tourism, transportation and industrial development. The first of these agreements was recently concluded with the Province of Manitoba. Federal purchases of goods and services, worth over $6 billion annually, will be planned in co-operation with the private sector to maximize regional and industrial benefits.

An Aggressive Trade Drive

Canada is a trading nation and a substantial part of our future growth must be led by exports. To spur this growth, the Government proposes a series of policy initiatives.

The scope of the successful Program for Export Market Development (PEMD) will be extended to support service industries and to encourage private trading houses.

Under current import duty remission procedures, "duty free export zones" will be established for the manufacturing and processing in bond of goods for export; as well, the Customs Act will be streamlined and modernized.

Active pursuit of world product mandates by Canadian subsidiaries of multi-national corporations, and the winning of additional export markets by Canadian companies, will be assisted by competition policy and direct funding.

To promote Canada's position as a Pacific Rim nation, the Government will move to facilitate establishment of the Asia Pacific Foundation of Canada.

While seeking new markets in the Pacific Rim, Europe and the developing world, we must continue to expand business and improve relations with our largest trading partner, the United States. Sectoral trade agreements with the United States will be examined in such areas as specialty steel products, urban transportation equipment, petrochemicals, textiles and clothing.

Competitive World-Class Industries

To compete in the world economy, Canada needs to modernize capital facilities, develop new industries and rebuild plant and equipment.

A key element in sustaining Canada's growth and creating jobs will be the increased use of micro-electronic technology. Legislation will be introduced to confirm the tax incentives for research and development announced in the April Recovery Budget. Further steps will be taken to implement the technology policy announced earlier this year, including creation of a national micro-electronics design network. The Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council will receive additional funds. A newly created Office of Industrial Innovation will work closely with Canadian industry to develop commercial application of new technologies.

The automobile industry is crucial to our economic well-being. Stabilizing employment in automobile manufacturing and its supplier industries is an essential task. The Government intends to seek a Canada-Japan Auto Agreement for the benefit of both countries, leading to additional production facilities and parts procurement in Canada.

Planning for industrial reconstruction and new investment must be based on business-labour-government consensus. Sectoral collaboration is at the core of the Government's industrial policy. Three business-labour task forces, on the automotive, aerospace and forestry industries, have now reported and are receiving responses. Another task force on the petro-chemical industry is underway. The benefits of such collaboration are already evident—in aerospace, more than 8,000 new, permanent, high-technology jobs and potential new export sales of over $20 billion will result from the Government's initiatives with Bell Helicopter and Pratt & Whitney. Additional task forces are planned on information technology, private trading houses, textiles and clothing, shipbuilding and a deep-sea fleet, and selected elements of the service sector.

Small scale entrepreneurs are the unsung heroes of the recovery. Small businesses are a perpetual source of inventiveness, valuable export earnings, and vast job creation potential. To assist this sector, an expanded Shop Canadian program will be launched. Access to federal programs for small businesses will be improved using the Federal Business Development Bank for delivery.

Tourism is a source of income for hundreds of thousands of Canadians and is particularly important to the small business sector. A national tourism strategy, developed in co-operation with the industry and the provinces, will promote each region's special features. Canada's attractions will be aggressively marketed both at home and abroad, and especially in the United States.

Young Canadians want to know their country better. Older Canadians deserve a chance to see the land they have built. A new Canadian rail pass, similar to the Eurailpass, and other forms of discount fares will be initiated.

Additional attention will be given to the needs of the travelling public. Domestic air transportation will be reviewed with the object of reducing fares. The safety of air travel will be improved through funding for a new independent Aviation Safety Board.

The VIA Rail system will be upgraded through construction of new maintenance facilities in Western, Central, and Atlantic Canada. New trains will be developed for light density routes. Passenger services will be extended where traffic volumes warrant.

Building on our Resources

As part of the Government's thrust for growth, measures will be introduced to modernize and upgrade the fishery, forestry, mining and agriculture.

The Government of Canada recently took the lead in a restructuring of the Atlantic fishing industry. Above and beyond the funds for restructuring itself, nearly $200 million is being put to work improving fish grading, freezer facilities and for other measures of benefit to independent processors and individual fishermen. Funds for the fishing vessel assistance program will be increased for 1983-1984.

The fishery agreement with the Province of Newfoundland marked a turning point in the Government's relations with that province. It provides a promising basis for future co-operation in the best interests of Newfoundlanders.

The Pacific fishery—commercial, sports and native—is an important national resource. The Government recognizes that the problems of this essential west coast industry require urgent attention.

In addition to monies already provided for capital facilities, substantial funding to assist the Quebec fishing co-operative will be announced shortly.

Many Canadian communities depend on mining or forestry as their sole industry. The new regional development agreements will pay particular attention to the mining sector. The Government's forest renewal strategy will also be extended via these agreements, through the conservation corps—Environment 2000—and by additional funding for forestry research and development.

To help ensure that food production will continue to be one of Canada's long-term strengths, a livestock stabilization program will be established in co-operation with the provinces. Amendments will be proposed to the powers of the National Farm Products Marketing Council. A commission of inquiry will study the problems of potato marketing in Eastern Canada. The maximum for advance payments for grain will be increased. Amendments will be introduced to the Western Grain Stabilization Act to make it more responsive to the needs of producers.

Abundant clean water is a precious Canadian resource. Investment in Prairie water and soil requirements will expand, especially through the work of the new hydrology laboratory in Saskatoon. The Government welcomes the United States Government's increased recognition of our mutual problems of water quality. The negotiation of an agreement with the United States on acid rain will be pursued and efforts to reduce Canadian sulphur emissions will proceed.

Energy policy must continue to command the attention of Canadians. The framework for achieving our national goals of energy self-sufficiency and increased Canadian ownership was put in place with the passage of the National Energy Program. It now forms an integral part of the long-term planning of energy companies, large and small. Petroleum Incentive Payments, in particular, encourage both new sources of supply and enhanced Canadian ownership. The Government will continue its strong commitment to the NEP in order to ensure that our goals are reached. Legislation will also be introduced to confirm the Canada-Nova Scotia Energy Agreement—a stimulus to new large-scale development off Canada's east coast.

III. Partnership for Recovery

In its early stages the recession, in combination with high rates of inflation, caused a deterioration in our sense of community. Each major group in society sought to blame economic decline on someone else. Later, however, Canadians recognized that to avert the downward spiral they needed to turn away from past divisions and work together to restore growth and prosperity. This new co-operative spirit has already produced tangible results in sharply reduced inflation, renewed growth, and enhanced employment prospects. But more is required.

The Minister of Finance has already begun a new round of economic consultations with provincial governments and other economic partners. Building on this initiative, the Government intends to introduce more permanent mechanisms of consultation. Regular economic outlook conferences involving labour, business, government and other interested parties will be called to pool information, to exchange views about the prospects ahead and to improve the basis for co-operative action. A new Industrial and Regional Development Board, jointly chaired by representatives from labour and business, will be formed to give practical advice on how best to implement the Government's industrial policy.

Work with the other economic partners to consolidate the gains from the 6 and 5 program of June 1982 will proceed.

While stimulating job creation, the Government will hold to a fiscal policy track which will contain and then curb the federal deficit as recovery strengthens. Administered prices will not be allowed to run ahead of other prices.

Following extensive and continuing consultations with the private sector and the provinces, the Government will introduce a new competition policy to bring market forces to bear in the continuing fight against inflation. The legislation will modernize conspiracy, monopoly and merger provisions, and promote the interests of consumers and small business through a freer marketplace. Amendments will also facilitate consortia to compete abroad for export sales and development projects.

To develop new ways in which co-operatives, credit unions and caisses populaires can make even more of a contribution to the economy, the Government will support the formation of a task force. It will explore how co-operatives can work alongside the private and public sectors to pursue an expanded role in the fishery, communications, manufacturing services and international trade.

Opening the Door to Labour

Labour has been and should continue to be a full partner in the process of economic recovery. Workers deserve a fair share of the recovery's benefits and an equal voice in the resolution of issues like technological change and productivity improvement.

North American, European and Japanese experience shows that productivity is a co-operative endeavour, not a punitive process of seeking more work for less reward. Greater productivity results from a combination of progressive management, ingenious technology, and high employee morale. It is the main long-term guarantor of increased real wages for Canadians.

A system of awards will be inaugurated to recognize the contributions of companies, labour organizations and individuals to Canada's productivity and competitiveness.

New technologies are a major hope for improving the quality of many monotonous and dangerous jobs. Workers in such jobs welcome new technology that is introduced in a planned and sensitive manner and that helps to create a safer environment and more secure employment. A fund will be created for Labour Canada to support research into the effects of technological change and to conduct joint information exchanges between management and workers.

The Government has worked closely with labour and business representatives to establish a new centre for productivity and employment growth. Reconciling the advantages of technology with the needs of workers will be one of the main tasks of this centre. Consultations to create the centre are being completed and linked with efforts to forecast and plan better for future labour requirements.

This Government believes that the maintenance and improvement of workers' rights are fully consistent with, and indeed essential to, increased productivity.

A fundamental aspect of productivity is a secure, safe environment for workers. Changes will be introduced to the Canada Labour Code to improve occupational safety and health, to establish labour standards relating to sexual harassment, and to upgrade standards on parental leave. Legislation will provide for consolidation under a single act of occupational safety and health standards that apply to federally regulated industries, and for the extension of the same standards to federal public servants.

Selected Crown corporations and units of the public service will be encouraged to test new methods of co-operative productivity improvement. These may have wider application in both public and private sectors.

The framework for the accountability and control of federal Crown corporations will be improved and a bill will be introduced to confirm in legislation the Canada Development Investment Corporation to better manage certain Crown assets. Labour representatives will be invited to join the boards of directors of selected Crown corporations. For many years, there has been an exchange of senior executives between corporations and the Government. This program, Interchange Canada, will now actively seek labour participants as well.

Part-time work is a growing trend. Consultations on pension rights and fringe benefits for the part-time work force will be undertaken with provincial governments, labour and business.

IV. Strengthening the Safety Net

The number one social priority of the Government is to reduce poverty among the aged. One of the first acts of the last session was to increase by $35 per month per household the Guaranteed Income Supplement. Indexation of the GIS means that this income has been fully protected against inflation. But more is required to help the single pensioner who is in need. Legislation will be introduced to increase the supplement for single pensioners providing additional assistance to more than 700,000 Canadians.

Beyond helping the elderly most in need, the pension system itself must be reformed to reduce poverty in the future.

The Government is committed to improving the adequacy and fairness of our retirement income system at the earliest possible date and in a manner that will not impede economic recovery. The report of the Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform will soon be published. Based on consensus, the Government will take steps to strengthen both public and private pension plans so that Canadians can be better assured of security, dignity and fulfillment in retirement. Reforms to be pursued under the Pension Benefits Standards Act will include improvements in coverage, vesting, portability, survivor benefits, benefit protection and mandatory splitting of pension credits. Concurrence of provincial governments will be sought on changes to pension benefit standards and to the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans in order to ensure that pensioners receive comparable benefits wherever they live in the country.

The health care system is of central importance to all Canadians. The Government is committed to maintaining the equitable system, built up over the past two decades, for payment of medical care and hospital costs. It must not be eroded and eventually destroyed through extra charges to the sick. A new Canada Health Act will be introduced to clarify the objectives of Canada's health insurance system and ensure that universal access to health care continues.

Financial assistance to the provinces for medical care, hospital care and post-secondary education programs will be greatly increased this year. More than $500 million, above and beyond the $13 billion estimated at the start of the year, will be transferred to the provinces in 1983-84. This increased level of financial support, at a time when resources are limited, demonstrates the strength of the Government's commitment to maintaining the quality and integrity of our country's health services and post-secondary education.

The Government will continue its efforts to help reduce the long-term costs of health care through attention to preventive programs, health facilities design, indoor air quality, physical fitness and support for para-medical services.

New Protection for Homes and Businesses

Canadians require improved security against losing their home or business.

The Government recognizes the concerns of homeowners and potential home buyers about the uncertainty of future mortgage costs. Legislation and other measures will be proposed to further strengthen confidence in the housing market by giving greater protection to homeowners. The choice of mortgage instruments will be broadened. These measures should increase the accessibility and security of home ownership, provide a greater measure of confidence and stability to the homebuilding industry, and enhance the flexibility of the mortgage market.

Attention will also be given to the need for long-term farm, fishery and small business financing.

High interest rates have taken a substantial toll among businesses, and especially among farmers, revealing important weaknesses in our bankruptcy laws. Revisions will be sought to increase the flexibility of these laws, to introduce a system of pre-bankruptcy arbitration for farmers, and to give greater protection to the wages of workers.

Personal Safety and Security

Canadians are increasingly concerned about the incidence of violent crime. Flowing from a complete review of the Criminal Code, legislative proposals will include increased mandatory sentences for violent offenders. Law enforcement to prevent importation of illegal drugs and trafficking will be improved. Stiffer penalties and procedures will be introduced to keep drunk drivers off our roads and highways. Support for voluntary crime prevention programs such as Neighbourhood Watch will be strengthened.

Victims of crime must receive more consideration. Greater flexibility will be provided to allow restitution to victims. Amendments to the Criminal Code will help speed up the administration of justice to ensure that victims do not suffer twice—during the crime and then during the wait for a trial.

Hard core pornography, which often emphasizes violence and degradation of women, has no place in Canadian society. The Government will act immediately to introduce amendments to the Criminal Code on pornography. It will also consider further legislation after receiving the reports of two expert committees, on pornography and prostitution; and sexual offenses against children.

You will be asked to consider revised legislation to create a Canadian Security Intelligence Service. A bill will be introduced to give full protection to the personal privacy and rights of individual Canadians in the conduct of the Service's activities. Changes to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act will provide for improved attention to grievances by private citizens.

So that individual Canadians and their communities can be better prepared for unanticipated events, the federal Government will work in co-operation with the provinces to give increased attention to emergency planning, during the coming year.

Securing Individual Rights

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Privacy and Access to Information legislation and other measures taken by the Government reaffirm our belief in the primacy of the individual. A bill will be introduced to revise all federal laws so that they conform to the Charter.

The rapid pace of social change in Canadian society has been reflected in a much higher divorce rate. You will be asked to consider a new Divorce Act to make this painful legal process more equitable and less complex. Work will continue with provincial governments to strengthen procedures for enforcement of maintenance and custody orders.

More funding will be provided for women's voluntary organizations and for research on women's issues. The recommendations of the Federal-Provincial Task Force on Family Violence will be pursued by continuing to allocate social housing units to provide shelters for the victims of such violence. The subject of day care has been placed on the agenda of a federal-provincial meeting of ministers responsible for the status of women, to be held early in the new year. A progress report on the decade since the United Nations' International Women's Year will be prepared.

Pilot projects will be undertaken to improve access to public transportation for the physically disabled. A national plan of action will continue the work of removing other obstacles to full participation of the disabled in our society, and Parliament will be given the opportunity to review progress in attaining this goal.

Action will soon be taken to respond to the report of the Parliamentary Committee on Indian Self-Government. The Government will introduce a bill to remove the long-standing grievance of discrimination against Indian women under the Indian Act. Funding will be provided for continued job creation programs on Indian reserves.

In March 1984, at the second Constitutional Conference on Aboriginal Rights, the Government will address equality rights, aboriginal title, treaties, aboriginal and treaty rights, land and resources, and aboriginal self-government.

V. Pursuing our Canadian Identity

We Canadians know that our diversity—our lack of pressure to conform to a single mold—is an integral part of our identity. Canadian variety, tolerance and civility are to be treasured and nurtured.

If Canadians are not to be strangers in their own land, however, radio and television must both inform us and enlarge our horizons. To this end, legislation will be presented to implement the new National Broadcasting Policy. This policy will assure greater Canadian content on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, extend French language program services, improve international marketing of Canadian cultural products, enhance regional and native access to broadcasting services, and provide incentives for private production of programs.

In recognition of the proliferation of electronic technologies, new policies for film, video and sound recording will be introduced to strengthen the private production industry. Revised telecommunications legislation will also be advanced. Proposals will be made to change the copyright laws to provide greater protection for the work of artists, authors, and entertainers.

The definition of a registered charity under the Income Tax Act and related matters will be referred to a joint parliamentary task force.

Immigrants have always brought new ideas, energy, and talent to Canadian society. A new act will be introduced to give statutory recognition to the Government's policy of multiculturalism. To recognize the valuable contributions of immigrants over 65 years of age, most of the formal requirements for Canadian citizenship, aside from residency, will be relaxed for those over that age. The Government will continue to promote a wider knowledge of our two official languages, and to support the voluntary sector in over a thousand projects of heritage language instruction, offered to 125,000 students. The Government will give early attention to the report of the Parliamentary Task Force on Visible Minorities and will act to strengthen laws against hate literature.

The Government will continue to promote balanced development of the Yukon and Northwest Territories, to settle aboriginal claims, and to foster the evolution of responsible government in the North. Funds will be provided through the Northern Oil and Gas Action Plan to ensure that northerners are involved in preparing for oil and gas development. In view of the need to sustain more permanent communities in the North, an early announcement will be made regarding the taxation of northern benefits.

The Government invites all Members to support its program for growth, opportunity, security, partnership and peace. The months ahead will be decisive ones for Canada. Special efforts will be made to consult with other parties on the timing of legislative measures. Constructive amendments proposed by the Opposition will be given full consideration.

Immediate action is proposed on recommendations by the all-party committee regarding parliamentary reforms.

The Government will continue to take an active interest in the work of the Senate-House Committee on Senate Reform.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament. You will be asked to consider a budget. You will be asked to consider other legislation required for the resolution of specific economic, social and legal problems.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations. The House of Commons withdraw. His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon ways by which the Senate of Canada could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country;

That the Committee include in its final report recommendations concerning the method of selection, powers, length of term for Senators, distribution of seats and other matters that the Committee considers relevant to the reform of the Senate;

That the following Senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Doody, Leblanc, Le Moynes, Lewis, Lucier, Molgat and Tremblay;

That the Committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament be referred to the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the quorum of the Committee be 10 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Committee be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever 5 members are present, so long as both Houses are represented;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee present its final report no later than January 31, 1984;

May I point out, honourable senators, that this provision differs from the motion that was adopted when the committee was first struck; the date for the presentation of the final report, which was then December 31, 1983, if I remember correctly, has now been postponed to January 31, 1984.

and;

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose and to select, if the House of Commons deemes advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

● (1405)

[English]

Hon. Daniel Riley: Do you want us to agree to this now?

Senator Frith: No, I am asking whether leave is granted to deal with it now, not agreement on the motion itself.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Riley: No.

Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Senator Riley said that leave is not granted, so leave is not granted. Therefore, we move on to the next order and we will have to deal with this motion at the next sitting of the Senate which will be in approximately two weeks.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, December 19, 1983, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Did Senator Frith say we shall adjourn until December 19 at 8 o'clock in the evening?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, the motion for adjournment, as you will have noted and has been underlined by Senator Guay, is for a week from this coming Monday. It is clear from the inquiries that I have made, and I guess it is a matter of general knowledge, that we are unlikely—in fact, it is virtually impossible—to receive any legislation from the other place next week. Quite apart from dealing with legislation, the sittings of the Senate allow for a Question Period and present an opportunity for committees to meet.

Under the present circumstances, committees are not in existence because the whips are meeting to consider recommendations for the selection of members. For those reasons, honourable senators, there did not seem to me to be any reason for us to come back next week.

When we resume on Monday, December 19, it is hoped that we will have the report of the Committee of Selection, which we can adopt that evening. That would then give the committees a chance to organize themselves on the Tuesday and Wednesday before we adjourn on December 21.

However, if we decide to adjourn for the Christmas recess at the same time as the other place, the following week will be a three-day week. I would remind honourable senators of the new rules applicable for this year in the other place stipulating that the House of Commons will adjourn on Wednesday, December 21.

While on the subject of adjournments, honourable senators, I apologize that I cannot give any definite information regarding the length of the Christmas adjournment. Over the last year we have used the adjournments of the other place as a guide, and, as honourable senators know, the other place has just completed an experimental year with some new rules which provide, of course, for the adjournment on December 21. However, next year those rules will no longer be in effect unless the other place chooses to renew them.

The house leaders in the other place have not furnished me with a definite date on which the House of Commons proposes to resume, but, if they follow the tentative rules, it would mean they would come back on the third Monday which is January 16. In that event, my intention would be to recommend that we adjourn until the following week to resume on January 23.

However, this motion relates only to what we do next week and the week after.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that the acting leader is right to be concerned that the Senate should make the best use of its time, and I concur in that. However, it seems to me that other scenarios are possible to achieve the same result, and I would ask him whether they have received consideration.

One is that, instead of postponing our next sitting to Monday, December 19, perhaps we could meet next week and do the same things my honourable friend has suggested we do on Monday, December 19, namely, receive the report of the Selection Committee, and have the committees set up and in place. I am not aware of any business that comes before any of the committees to be re-established.

If the acting leader has decided that we should return on the week following next week, another possibility I would ask him to think about is whether the Senate should meet on Tuesday afternoon instead of Monday evening. That would give senators on the Selection Committee an opportunity to meet on Tuesday morning in order to do their work which should not take too long. The remainder of the two days can be used for the various committees to set themselves up, which, I think, is really a matter of formalities, there being no business that I am aware of that would require their attention during that time.

I would propose these two alternatives to the acting leader—either we sit next week and not the following week or, if he thinks that is ill-advised, sit on Tuesday, December 20, instead of Monday, December 19.

While I am on my feet, may I also refer to his trailer concerning when we resume in January and suggest to him that, unless there is a good reason for doing so—of which I am not aware—instead of returning on Monday, January 23, we stick to our usual day of Tuesday, January 24, for resuming our sittings. Perhaps my honourable friend could tell me if I have misunderstood the work that lies ahead of us, or whether the outline I have sketched is a fair summary of what we are expected to do in the next little while.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we did consider the other scenarios which Senator Roblin quite properly says exist. Although there is no overpowering reason why those other scenarios were not accepted, allow me to explain why an adjournment until the week after next was chosen.

It is possible that during that week we may receive something on the income tax amendments. That would at least enable us to make a reference of the income tax amendments to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for a pre-study. I was unable to obtain any information that would encourage me to believe that we could do so next week, so I chose the following week.

On the question of the sitting of the Senate on Monday next rather than on Tuesday, I think I explained that; if we are to adopt the report of the Committee of Selection on Monday night, the committees would thereby be given more time to meet and there would be less likelihood of an overlapping of the scheduled meetings. We are hoping that the Committee of Selection will meet on Monday before the Senate sits, so that its report will be ready for Monday evening. This would allow the other committees at least two mornings and an evening in which to conduct their business.

Therefore, while I cannot say that any of Senator Roblin's suggestions are unreasonable, perhaps, on balance, it is better to follow the program I outlined earlier.

Honourable senators, with respect to our return in January, I have no trouble with the Senate's sitting on Tuesday rather than on Monday. Perhaps we will discuss this matter further when we sit again the week after next.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. When Senator Frith read the motion in respect of setting up a new committee—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Riley, we are discussing another motion. You may rise after that.

Senator Riley: I rise on a question of privilege.

Senator Frith: Senator Riley, perhaps we could finish speaking to this motion—

Hon. Charles McElman: This is a question of privilege.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What kind of privilege are we speaking about?

Senator Riley: I am speaking on a motion of Senator Frith which was misunderstood by me and, I am sure, by others.

When Senator Frith made a motion regarding the setting up of the new committee on Senate reform, I was present in the chamber. I did not listen to the interpretation at the time and I must confess that I sometimes find it difficult to follow Senator Frith when he speaks the other official language. I seem to follow other people more easily.

I had no intention of stopping the discussion on this particular motion, but I noticed that, when His Honour the Speaker was about to read the motion again, some honourable senators said "Dispense."

Honourable senators, I did not gather the full import of the motion. I would be happy to hear it discussed. Rather than embarrass any of my fellow senators, particularly Senator Frith, the Acting Leader of the Government, I will say that I would be disposed to having discussion on the motion proceed at this time, if that is agreeable to honourable senators. I may have some questions regarding the motion. I know, from speaking about this with other honourable senators, that questions are in their minds as well. I do not know if the wording of this motion is the same as that in the motion setting up the committee in the last session.

In my view we are entitled to full comprehension of the motion. I think we should be able to study the motion properly before anyone says "Dispense." I am sure that many honourable senators would agree.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to ask for unanimous consent to revert to Notices of Motions, but first I should like the motion now before us disposed of.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, December 19, 1983, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

REFORM OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE AGREED TO

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with reference to the motion which was proposed earlier relating to the re-establishment of the Joint Committee on Senate Reform, I point out, before turning the floor over to Senator Riley, that the motion is a repetition of the one which was passed in the preceding session establishing the Special Joint Committee on Reform of the Senate. Since it is a special committee, it does not fall within the procedures of the Committee of Selection. Senators presently serving on the committee have been nominated to serve again, and Senator Molgat, the joint chairman of the committee, would like to continue the work of the committee immediately. The only other change is that the date by which the committee has to report is January 31, 1984, rather than December 1, 1983.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is a tricky problem which at present I do not quite see my way through, and I would appreciate the opinion of Senator McElman and other honourable senators who are interested in the rules. Where do we stand on this matter? The subject has been before the house and it has been decided by the house. If we have to rescind ourselves in one session, is it in order for us to do so, or does one say that if there is unanimous consent we can do anything? I would appreciate hearing the opinion of others on this subject.

Senator Frith: We should remember that all that was turned down was leave. The motion was not dealt with. Therefore we are not dealing with the subject that was properly raised by Senator Roblin, namely, the problem of re-introducing a motion. Since leave was not granted, the matter would have been dealt with at the next sitting, because it would appear on the Order Paper under "Motions". I believe that clearly we can now revert to Notices of Motions and reconsider the question of leave with unanimous consent. If unanimous consent is given, we would be entitled to deal with the motion now.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, the problem concerning our rules is that we, on this side, believe that the matter has been decided by this house and that we cannot vote twice on the same subject during the same sitting.

Senator Frith: It is only a question of leave.

Senator Asselin: It is much more than that. The Speaker asked whether there was leave to move the motion. The Senate then decided not to give leave. The question was therefore settled at that time. I am sorry, but we cannot during the same sitting come back to a motion which has already been decided by the house.

Unfortunately, we shall have to wait until our next sitting to put the motion because a decision has already been made. If my honourable friend wants to refer to the various paragraphs of Rule 49, he will see that once a decision has been made, it is impossible to come back to the same motion during the same sitting.

I would like the opinion of the Speaker on this matter, but I believe that this is what is stated in our rules.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that the difference lies in the fact that there was no decision, but simply a refusal to grant leave. That is not a decision. I also believe that we could, with unanimous consent, do it this way even if a vote had been taken. However, this was not the case.

Senator Asselin: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that once the Senate has made a decision, it is the same as taking a vote. Whether it is called a vote or something else, a decision has been made. Unfortunately, this decision was made on division.

As long as the motion is not deferred to a subsequent sitting, I do not think that we are authorized to come back to a motion during one sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, unless we want to have a procedural debate, let us say that there was no discussion or decision on the motion itself.

[English]

The question on the motion has not been put. We are dealing with whether or not leave is granted. If I have the unanimous consent of the house to come back and determine whether leave is granted, that is different from the motion being defeated. My decision is that if honourable senators wish to revert to determining whether leave is granted, then I will accept their wishes; and if there is objection to that proposal, I will accept it as well.

So, honourable senators, is leave granted?

Senator Asselin: What do you say, Senator Riley?

Hon. Daniel Riley: If leave means that there will be an opportunity to discuss the motion, then I have no objection to granting leave.

Senator Roblin: That is what it means.

The Hon. the Speaker: It could not mean anything else. Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have said everything I wish to say as mover of the motion. I believe that Senator Riley wishes to speak now.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, if Senator Riley cannot deliver, I should say our group had no intention of opposing its introduction today, on the contrary. This had already been discussed with our colleagues on the Committee. There has been too much work, effort and dedication by some Senators on the Committee for us to oppose the re-establishment of the Committee as provided for in this motion.

We had a few comments to make. I broached the subject when the Committee met this morning, and other Senators, including Senator Leblanc, Senator Tremblay, and Senator Doody discussed the matter also. It is our view that it is somehow rash for the Steering Committee to suggest that we could conclude our work by January 31st. Since its appointment in April, the Committee has met for days on end. It has travelled all across Canada hearing a considerable number of witnesses. We had only started working on a first draft of a report.

As it was indicated this morning by some Senators, with all the good will in the world we could not sit 24 hours a day and produce a document that would not reflect the views of the Senators on this Committee. We need more time and further consideration and discussion. Before we submit a final text, the Committee members will have to meet several times in order to submit, if not a majority report, at least a report that would stand on its feet.

Therefore, we on this side of this House suggest that the Chairman or Co-chairmen of this Committee should come back before both Houses and ask for a further extension. We were given to understand at the meeting this morning that the Government was hoping to have the findings of that Committee for the constitutional meeting to be held next March.

But the members of the Committee are not concerned about that matter being put on the agenda of the First Ministers' Conference next March. That is not our responsibility. The Committee's responsibility is to prepare and submit a responsible report that will take into consideration the evidence brought before that Committee where we had the privilege of looking at the matter of Senate reform. The January 31 deadline does not leave us enough time, so that we will have to ask the Senate for an extension. No attempt should be made to limit the debates of the future members of that committee by saying that they must proceed rapidly and that they will have to sit three days next week. In any event, the Senate will not sit next week. Will this committee have to sit? The question is relevant because the senators who will sit on the committee do have other things to do and will not be able to attend regularly. It is unrealistic to think that we will be able to complete the proceedings before January 31. Right now, we ought to select a later date, possibly April 30. We would be rested and have time to consider every aspect of the work we have to do before producing an intelligent report.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: I want to ask a question to Senator Frith. You mention the date of January 31 in your motion, but I suspect it was not your decision. It must have been decided by the co-chairman of the joint committee who undoubtedly had something to say about picking the date of January 31. Would Senator Molgat comment on that?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I am pleased to answer the question. When I made that suggestion on behalf of the committee last week and recommended that the committee be struck as early as possible at the beginning of this new session, I did say that it was not a decision of the co-chairmen. It was taken by the steering committee. It was later approved by the whole committee and the members asked the co-chairmen to intervene and seek an extension. We discussed the matter with the minister responsible, Mr. MacGuigan, and reported to our committee that the position of Mr. MacGuigan was that the government was anxious to have the recommendations of the committee. The government wants to submit proposals to the first ministers' conference scheduled for March, I believe. It is not a government decision. Since it is a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, it is the responsibility of both houses, to make the necessary decisions. Mr. MacGuigan told us that he did not have any objection to the date proposed for producing our report, at the end of January, but he would have preferred an earlier date. We consulted our colleagues and the other parties in the House. It was agreed to ask for an extension until January 31. The committee has scheduled its agenda so as to complete its work by that date. In fact, we did try to set an earlier date. We were hoping to table the report in both Houses when they meet after the Christmas recess. We opted for January 31 so as to have more time.

Of course, we had no idea that in the meantime we would have a holiday last week, or when the Houses would meet again. We had to make a decision, although we did not know exactly what would happen. We have set our agenda. The committee was unable to sit during the holiday because it did not exist.

I thank my colleagues for getting together this morning to speed up the work of our committee. It was an informal meeting since we did not exist yet as a committee. Some senators have complained that we have not had enough time, in view of the few days off we had recently. Yet, when I made that suggestion last week, I indicated that our committee would strive to complete its study before the set date. Because of the problems, we could not make any promise. I feel that my current remarks are consistent with those of Senator Asselin. Evidently I cannot be the co-chairman of this committee, for it does not exist yet. Its members have not yet been selected either. We will allow all those who have views to express them before the committee. Should we not be able to fulfill our mandate by a determined date, we would return to this house to seek a new extension. I would ask the Government House Leader to make other arrangements. If our committee could be reinstated forthwith, we would get back to work immediately.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, let me contribute a few remarks to clearly identify the problem. We have been told in committee that in order for the report to be printed by the end of January, it must be delivered to the printers a month before, that is to say before the Christmas recess. How long have we left to complete this report? We only have two days left, unless we sit next week. If we do sit at the same time as the Senate, there are December 20 and 21 left. This morning, we dealt unofficially with the project prepared by the committee staff. So far, we have considered what amounts to two out of eight chapters. I should add that one of the chapters was straightforward, dealing with the schedule of the committee. This morning we started to examine a somewhat controversial chapter, but we have not finished it. We feel almost as much time will be required for the six remaining chapters. Should things go as well as they did this morning, we will probably need three days of full time study to complete the study of the six chapters remaining. We have only two days left. It is therefore physically impossible for the report to be printed and tabled in the houses before the end of January. You would not be dealing realistically with this issue if you did not take this fact into account. Accordingly the time limit of January 31st should be postponed. We need to be given enough time to conscientiously fulfill our mandate.

[English]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, it seems to me that we are permitting—in this Parliament as well as in some of the provincial legislatures—governments to put the cart before the horse. The government should come before Parliament requesting deadlines instead of setting them. Instead of having Parliament meet the schedules of the government, I think it is time that the government met the schedule of Parliament. Parliament is supreme, not the government.

If it is not convenient for a federal-provincial conference to await Parliament, then that is their problem, not Parliament's.

When the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs undertook its study of the first amendment to the Constitution Act, 1982, the witnesses who appeared before the committee said repeatedly that what took place at a federal-provincial conference was done without proper study, without proper advice from the legal advisers of the Crown and without an understanding of what the final resolution meant. That opinion was expressed by at least one of the Premiers, although others backed off from expressing their disapproval of that resolution. So we have had before us an example of a federal-provincial conference taking precipitate action without having sufficiently studied a subject.

Now that we are undertaking studies relating to changes to the institution of Parliament itself, any committee established for that purpose, jointly or otherwise, should be given the time it requires, even if it takes a year to conduct its study. So I suggest to you that we should remove any reference to a deadline date in this resolution; the conference of first ministers should wait until Parliament has studied this matter, rather than having it the other way round.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McElman: Once the committee has completed its study, made its report and/or recommendations, the first ministers can then consider the actions of Parliament.

There is one question I should like to ask the former chairman of that committee. Under the former resolution the committee had the right to travel. It is my understanding that the committee has completed its study and there is no need for it to travel any further. If that is the case, why does the committee now seek the right to travel?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: They should go to Australia.

Senator Molgat: If I may be permitted to reply—

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I think it is important at this stage to indicate the outcome of the motion which was moved in December 1982 to establish the committee. Everybody agreed at the time, but the committee began to sit only in early May.

In the initial motion, the committee was granted one year to table its report; but in view of the fact that for a reason which I do not know, the committee began to sit only in May, it would be reasonable to follow Senator Asselin's suggestion to extend the time limit to March 31, 1984. Then the committee would have had one year to fulfill its mandate, and considering the progress the committee has made so far in its study of the first draft of the report, it could meet the late March deadline. Not everybody thinks that the said report could be tabled by March 31. I am under the impression that a new motion will be moved to obtain an extension.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that I can focus on the question by referring to what Senator Deschatelets has said. I did not pick this date of January 31.

Senator Riley: Is this the end of the discussion? If you speak now does that end the discussion?

Senator Frith: It should.

[Senator McElman.]

Senator Riley: In that case, I wish to say a word or two.

Senator Frith: That is why, when I stood up, I waited to see if someone else wished to speak on the matter.

Senator Asselin: You are too fast.

Senator Frith: I will wait, then; patience is a virtue.

Senator Riley: If this discussion has done nothing else, it has added to my confusion. Of course, I don't have a great deal of parliamentary experience—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Riley: —but I have always thought that when a session was prorogued, everything on the order paper died. Senator Asselin has stated that the members of the committee met this morning. To what committee is he referring?

Senator Asselin: It was an unofficial meeting.

Senator Riley: But you stated that members of the committee met this morning. There is no committee. The committee was instructed, when it was appointed a year ago, to produce a report by December 2. Apparently it was unable to do so. I do know of at least one person who wished to appear before that committee as a witness, a witness who would have made a valuable contribution to the report of that committee.

We have been told that the committee has just about completed its study.

Senator Asselin: It is in the process of that.

Senator Riley: In any event, the committee is dead now. Anything left unfinished in the last session of this Parliament died on the Order Paper when the session was prorogued.

Someone has suggested that we can simply retype the instructions for that committee, and that might be an answer.

I am inquisitive by nature and I should like to know whether this committee—when and if it is reconstituted or a new committee is appointed—will have a new agenda? Will witnesses be given the opportunity to appear before the new committee, or will the report be based on the evidence given before the old committee?

One can do everything behind the scenes; one can pick up where one left off, but in this instance the committee died when the session was prorogued. It does not exist any more. We are supposed to be senior legislators.

● (1450)

Senator Roblin: That's right.

Senator Riley: In my experience, particularly in recent months—

Senator Asselin: Or your lack of experience.

Senator Riley: In recent months, I have observed some steamrolling going on in the Senate and that goes against the grain. My point is that, if a new committee is set up, it should be set up properly. I do not think we should be told that "perhaps we can have the report by January 31." I do not think that any member of that committee or any honourable senator of this hallowed house believes that the report will be forthcoming by January 31. Why not set a realistic date now?

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Or no date.

Senator Riley: Or no date. Perhaps that might be better. Perhaps, if we did not set up a committee, that might avert a few arguments between the deputy leader and myself.

When I was a member of a special committee we were given a deadline; we produced our report within a few days of that deadline.

This committee deals with a very important subject.

Senator Asselin: You can amend the motion if you want to.

Senator Riley: I am afraid, if I were to give vent to my Irish feelings, I would amend the motion by having it tabled for six months.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Are you looking for a seconder?

Senator Riley: Senator Godfrey just made a remark to me which I should like to repeat. He said: "I'm 'agin' reform." If I were "agin" reform, I would say that we should gather up the knowledge from the people who travel all over the world and have them relate their experiences to the Senate.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear.

Senator Riley: This body is quite capable of reforming itself, and that reform should start here. We have shown within the past two years that we are capable of introducing procedures of reform within the Senate. That is why I suggest that we give this motion a six month's hoist.

Senator Asselin: Let's amend the motion.

Senator Riley: I would need some time to think about that. I should like to mention to Senator Asselin that this is a bilingual house and if you are unilingual, as I am, except for a little understanding of French, unless your translation equipment is working you do not get the full purport of some of the statements made by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Asselin: I accept your reasoning.

Senator Riley: I think we should give more thought to this motion, and particularly the points that were raised in respect of the deadline for a report by this new committee. If this committee is reconstituted, it should re-examine its agenda, take all the time it needs and, if there are witnesses who can add something to the report, those witnesses should be heard. When everyone has fully decided what should go into the report, we can then sit down and produce an intelligent report that reflects the recommendations and the wishes of the people of Canada.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, following some of the remarks of Senator Riley and Senator McElman, I should like to ask the co-chairman of the special joint committee—

Senator Frith: There is no committee yet.

Senator Haidasz: Then, I should like to ask Senator Molgat a question. If, as intimated, the committee will no longer hear any witnesses but will conduct a study of possible draft reports to be completed by January 31, I should like to find out from Senator Molgat whether the committee will be proposing an elected Senate based on the one in Australia. I should also like to know whether members of the special joint committee have considered studying the Senate of Australia on the spot to find out how it is working and whether it would be workable in Canada.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, with leave, may I answer specifically the questions that were asked of me. At the outset, I should like to say that it sounds as though I am defending a position, and, quite frankly, I am not. Admittedly, I was the co-chairman, but not by choice. A vote was taken by the committee; I did not seek the job. I might also say that the committee is a creature of this chamber and all the committee does is follow the instructions of this chamber. Honourable senators set the date of December 1 in the first instance, and our job was to try to meet that date as conscientiously as we could. When it was obvious that that date could not be met, we asked for an extension, and at that time January 31 looked like an appropriate date, and the committee members concurred. I cannot disagree with Senator Tremblay that, if the committee does not meet next week, it is unlikely that that deadline can be met; but that will be up to the committee.

What the future committee will do will obviously be up to the committee. Senator McElman mentioned the possibility of travel. Once the new committee is reconstituted, I think it would be feasible for it to do some travelling on its own; on the other hand, it might, for example, be faced with the need to call a special witness in order to obtain further details on the subject; or it might decide to appoint a subcommittee to do some travelling in order to interview certain witnesses. These are only possibilities, however, and, based on what the previous committee had been doing, are not likely to occur; but rather than having to come back for another extension, I think it would be safer to have that leeway.

In response to the specific question of Senator Haidasz, on a number of occasions suggestions were made to the committee that it might consider investigating the Australian situation.

Hon. C. William Doody: That was suggested several times.

Senator Molgat: It was suggested again in this chamber recently that this should be done. Owing to time constraints, the committee could not consider it. So the committee agreed to forgo an in-depth, on the spot study of the Australian situation.

Senator Asselin: With leave, may I ask the acting leader, considering what has been said about this motion this afternoon, if he is ready to amend it in order to extend the work of this committee until April 1, 1984?

Senator Frith: I will speak to that when I close the debate.

• (1500)

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, Senator Asselin has proposed April 1—poisson d'avril—which may be apropos if they do not produce a report by that date. I think the question of an amendment should be left open because I do not agree with Senator Molgat, the erstwhile joint chairman of the committee, that the committee is a creature of this house; the committee is a creature of both houses. Members of the House of Commons constituted the majority of the members of the defunct committee.

It was my understanding that the former committee had completed hearing evidence from witnesses. Do I take it now that there is a possibility that there will be variations in the agenda and that this new committee will be stuck with the progress made by the former, now defunct, committee? Can we expect that a new committee will be formed with a new agenda and a new list of witnesses to be heard?

I would point out to Senator Roblin that I did not gather my information on the Australian system by travelling there with a Senate committee; I gathered it from talking to Australians. I have shared some experiences with members of the upper house in Australia. They say that we have the better system.

If some travelling is to be done, it might be as well to invite some members of the Australian upper house, from the different parties of that house, to visit Canada and appear before our committee.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I had refrained from entering this discussion because I felt that some of those who had spoken had expressed my own views on the matter. I can appreciate that the house leader is in a rather difficult position. I am not entirely sure whether I can help him, but I would like to try.

It appears that there is some considerable doubt in the Senate as to the advisability of proceeding with this motion at the present time, and that doubt is shared by both sides of the chamber. That is understandable because it is our Senate that they want to reform and, regardless of our views on this matter one way or another, I think senators are quite right in thinking that they should certainly have an equal voice, if not even a preponderant voice. Perhaps that is expecting too much, but, certainly, we should be heard. The implication of many of the remarks made today is that we will not be properly heard if we are restricted to the time period in the motion.

However, another chamber has to be considered. I understand, and I hope the Acting Leader of the Government will correct me if I am wrong, that the other place may be considering this very resolution this afternoon, and the considerations which appear important to us will not carry the same weight in the other body.

I should like to suggest, if it would be helpful to the Acting Leader of the Government, that this chamber might be agreeable to let the motion stand on the order paper at the present time in order to give him an opportunity to consult with the leadership of the other house to see whether any arrangement can be made whereby this matter can be solved in a way that will better suit the wishes of many honourable senators.

It is an unusual proposal. It is not covered by any rule that I know of. If we wish to be, we are the masters of our own fate. If it met with unanimous consent, we could let the matter stand and give the leader an opportunity to see if he can adjust this matter with his colleagues in the other place in a manner that meets with the wishes of this chamber.

Senator Asselin: With the wishes of his colleagues in caucus.

Senator Roblin: I would not like to interfere with the leader and his caucus. He has always shown himself able to negotiate with them. I would not presume that I could do any better.

I think he might consider my idea and, while it might mean that he will miss the eloquent speeches that Senators Bosa and Hébert will make on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne this afternoon, and perhaps a little of what I have to contribute, I am sure he can bear that with equanimity if the issue we have before us now could be settled in a more agreeable fashion.

Honourable senators, that is my contribution to the harmony of the Senate. I would ask my honourable friend whether there is anything in what I have said that could help him in his difficult task of reconciling this resolution with the obvious wishes of honourable senators.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, before the acting leader responds to those several questions, I have one point to make and one question to ask.

I was not a member of the now defunct committee, but I did attend several of the sessions. I want to say that I was very impressed with the work of the committee and, in particular, with the leadership shown by our esteemed colleague, Senator Molgat. I think it would be a disaster to lose the benefits of all the work done during the past year or so. The quicker we re-constitute that committee—perhaps not with exactly the same membership—and get down to work, the better.

I agree with my colleagues, Senators McElman and Riley, that we should not set an arbitrary date, either directly or by implication.

The question I have to ask is not posed in any critical or derogatory sense. I have heard several suggestions, apparently made in good faith, that we should send a delegation to Australia to analyze their elected Senate and compare it with ours. It is my recollection that only a year or two ago a delegation of four or five senators went to Australia to carry out this very same task. My question is: What in Heaven's name did they do there? Australia is not next door. Presumably this delegation will spend two or three weeks there since they will have to travel half way around the world to get there. What did they do when they were there? I have never been told what they did, nor do I know what information they gathered.

Honourable senators, why should the idea be advanced—in all sincerity, apparently—that another committee should be sent out there at this time?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, what concerns me about the suggestion that the motion not be passed today is this: we have heard from Senator Molgat that it will be impossible to meet the January 31 deadline unless the joint committee meets next week. This may create the impression, with the public, that this body is not so keen that the joint committee get on with the job.

I would point out, honourable senators, that when we return in January, if it appears that that deadline is unrealistic, there is nothing wrong in seeking a further extension. By specifying January 31 as a deadline, we are not making any final decision. I believe we are suggesting, however, that that committee ought to meet next week to get on with the job. It should not be stalling; that is all.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I know that in the past—and probably in the future—people might have felt that, on behalf of the government, I am a steamroller. In this case, however, I feel more like a “steamrollee” than a “steamroller.” I should like to explain that I did not choose the deadline of January 31. This motion originated when I asked Senator Molgat a month ago to tell me what he wanted me to do. At that time I told him that it was up to the committee to decide what it was going to request of the Senate. It was not easy for Senator Molgat to comply, because, as Senator Roblin has pointed out, this is a joint committee. All decisions must be agreed to by the members from the other place as well as the members from this place.

As honourable senators are aware, one of the usual characteristics of a special committee is that it is given a date on which to report. An extension of that date has been requested. Senator Molgat spoke with me before he came into the chamber today. I told him that, on behalf of the government in the Senate, I would undertake to lend a sympathetic ear to an extension beyond January 31, if it becomes apparent—and it looks as if it will—that such an extension is necessary.

Honourable senators, I would be happy to consider some other solution. I have no axe to grind, from any point of view—official or unofficial—on this matter. I suggest that the motion be passed as it is, bearing in mind my undertaking, on behalf of the government in the Senate, to lend a sympathetic ear to a request for any further extension. On the basis of what I heard today I will recommend that, if the committee wants an extension, it should be granted.

Honourable senators, I repeat that this is a joint committee. I presume that the motion will be passed in the other place with the same undertaking as to a further extension. Therein lies the advantage to passing this motion—it mentions a date which has already been negotiated. That being so, it seems to me that this motion solves a purely technical problem if I undertake, as I now do, to be extremely sympathetic to a request for a further extension, with the understanding that the further extension will have to be negotiated with our colleagues from the other place.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. I believe it is permissible for me to put the question, if that is agreeable to honourable senators.

My question is very simple. I should like to ask the deputy leader, eyeball to eyeball, if he believes that the report of this committee can be tabled in this chamber by January 31.

Senator Frith: Is that the question?

Senator Riley: Yes, that is the question.

Senator Frith: No, I do not think so.

Senator Riley: Why, then, set a date for January 31?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have explained why I think that date should be kept. I have explained why I thought that my conviction that it will not be met should result in our lending a sympathetic ear to a request for a further extension.

Motion agreed to, on division.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Peter Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Jacques Hébert, moved:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

[English]

He said: Honourable senators, it is a privilege and an honour for me to move the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Before proceeding with my remarks on the subject, however, I should like to say how sad I am that both the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Olson and Senator Flynn, are absent. This chamber is not the same without them. Both are absent because of illness and I should like to extend to them my best wishes for a speedy recovery.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bosa: I also pray for the continued good health of our two acting leaders.

Honourable senators, we are on the threshold of a breakthrough in two of the most critical and crucial areas of concern that have dominated Canadian thinking for the past several years: to secure peace and to secure prosperity. There are reasons for cautious optimism in the future. First, I should like to make a few remarks about the peace initiative undertaken by the Prime Minister, after which I shall address myself to the economic and social issues.

Canada has never had a major war or a major revolution on its soil. Yet, within our boundaries we have all the elements that cause other countries to go to war. We have pronounced ethnic and religious differences and major regional disparities. Yet we have always managed to resolve our differences peacefully and amicably through the art of compromise. The patriation of the Constitution and the adoption of the National Energy Program are two cases in point. Because of our ethnic make up and our two official languages we are psychologically prepared to play a credible role in the cause of world peace.

Indeed we have precedents in this area. We all recall Prime Minister Pearson's peace initiative during the Suez Canal dispute in 1954 which brought about peace and stability for a number of years in the Middle East. So it is in the Canadian tradition to continue to play this role for humanitarian as well as for economic reasons.

One third of Canada's wealth is derived from exports. We have a vital interest in promoting and maintaining international stability. It is with this background that our Prime Minister, consistent with his efforts of several decades, has embarked on a new peace initiative at this critical time of high international tensions.

Prime Minister Trudeau and his government have not only continued the Canadian policy of abjuring nuclear weapons, but have also launched a number of initiatives to encourage nuclear disarmament and thus help to prevent a nuclear holocaust. Although a member of NATO, which includes three of the five nuclear powers, and fully capable of producing nuclear weapons herself, Canada has nevertheless renounced the production of these weapons since their advent in 1945. Under the leadership of Mr. Trudeau, Canada has withdrawn from any nuclear role by her armed forces in Europe and is now completing the process of replacing the nuclear-capable aircraft assigned to the defence of North America with sophisticated but conventionally armed aircraft. Canada has thus become the first country to have chosen to divest itself of nuclear weapons.

In his speech of May 26, 1978 to the United Nations General Assembly Special Session on Disarmament, Prime Minister Trudeau identified the "technological impulse" that lies behind the development of strategic nuclear weapons as a dangerous and de-stabilizing factor in the nuclear arms race between the superpowers. Each new weapons system raises concerns about a first-strike capability, about verification, and about the erosion of the difference between nuclear and conventional warfare. To counter this threat, the Prime Minister proposed four concrete measures which, taken together, would curb the technological dynamic of the nuclear arms race and buy time for further negotiations leading to actual reductions in nuclear arsenals. These four measures involved the negotiation of agreements to impede further development of nuclear warheads by means of a comprehensive test ban; to complement the ban on the testing of warheads by stopping the flight testing of all new strategic delivery vehicles; to set a definite limit on the availability of nuclear weapons material by prohibiting all production of fissionable material for weapons purposes; and to limit and then progressively to reduce military spending on new strategic weapons systems. It was a tribute to the stature of the Prime Minister as an international statesman that his "strategy of suffocation" was substantially embodied in the Final Document and Programme of Action of the Special Session.

The events leading up to the Prime Minister's most recent initiative are well known. Relations between east and west, between the United States and the Soviet Union, have deteriorated to a dangerous degree under the impact of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the needless shooting down of a South Korean civilian airliner which strayed over Soviet territory this past September. The Prime Minister publicly described the latter incident, which claimed 269 lives, as an illustration of the danger of hair-trigger reaction in the nuclear age.

Internationally and in Canada, public opinion is increasingly concerned about the build-up of nuclear missiles in Europe at a time of growing Soviet-American animosity. There was, and is, an inarticulate demand that someone do something to arrest the downward spiral towards a confrontation of the great powers.

After a period of study and consultation, the Prime Minister announced his forthcoming initiatives in a speech on October 27 to the Conference on Strategies for Peace and Security in the Nuclear Age. This speech expressed the conviction that:

—just as war is too important to leave to the generals, so the relationship between the superpowers may have become too charged with animosity for East-West relations to be entrusted to them alone.

While the two-track response of NATO to the Soviet build-up of SS-20 missiles in Europe remained valid, he proposed a "third rail" of high-level political energy to speed the course of agreement. In his tour of West European capitals in early November, Prime Minister Trudeau began the process of attempting to organize the political will necessary to break the stalemate in east-west relations.

The Prime Minister's initiative has now received the firm support of the Commonwealth Heads of Government assembled in New Delhi. He has had the opportunity of discussing the details of his program with Chinese Premier Zhao Ziyang in Peking; the Soviets have displayed sufficient curiosity about his initiative to agree to see a Canadian emissary to discuss it; and, within the past day or so, President Reagan has indicated his willingness to meet with the Prime Minister in Washington around the middle of the month.

Prime Minister Trudeau has never underestimated the difficulties, differences and animosities which his initiative faces. He has not overestimated and does not overestimate its chances of final success. But the validity of the attempt has already been proven. The Prime Minister's initiative has given ordinary people all over the world and on both sides of the Iron Curtain a glimmer of hope at a time when there seems to be a mood of growing hopelessness over the nuclear issue and the threat of nuclear holocaust. He has at least established a foundation for the injection of high-level political willpower into the process of rebuilding confidence and negotiating arms limitation agreements. He has encouraged, indeed partially forced, the great powers, however unwillingly or reluctantly, to consider a concrete proposal for a five-power summit conference and specific measures of nuclear arms limitation despite their mutual rivalries and animosities.

There is a consistency that runs through the actions of Prime Minister Trudeau over the past twenty years. The opposition to the acquisition by Canada of nuclear-capable weapons systems, the negotiation of a non-nuclear role for Canada within NATO and the adoption of non-nuclear-capable weapons systems, the emphasis on the importance of the North-South dialogue, as well as his current initiative, have all been consequences of his efforts to promote peace.

But the international situation is very fragile. Just as a stone can derail a train, an incident like the Korean airline tragedy, or a war similar to the Falkland Islands conflict, where countries are forced to choose sides, or the present confrontation in Lebanon, could trigger the "Sarajevo" of the Third World War.

Let us hope that the Prime Minister's efforts will bring the great powers to the table reasonably soon in order that they may commence a dialogue which would lead them to a meaningful disarmament.

The other area that has intensely preoccupied Canadians is the economy, both at home and abroad. Economic progress is a crucial contributor to peace and stability. Canada will continue to maintain its commitment to overseas development aid and will increase such aid in the years to come.

Canada, like most other countries, is just emerging from a particularly difficult period. For a variety of reasons, the world economy suffered a very severe recession in 1981. Canada suffered from that recession at least as much as, if not more than, most other industrialized nations because of its heavy reliance on foreign trade. However, our economy is now well on the way to recovery. Our medium-term prospects are at least as good as, if not better than, those of the majority of industrialized countries. While pessimists still abound, the projections of Canadian firms and international organizations that engage in forecasting are increasingly positive. It is expected that inflation will continue to decrease slightly, that economic growth will be renewed, and that unemployment will continue on its downward trend.

Since last December 353,000 new jobs have been created in the economy. Through the injection of close to $5 billion in stimulus, the April 1983 recovery budget set in motion hundreds of needed capital projects across Canada and helped make possible a return to much higher rates of private sector investment. But even with a strong recovery, the government believes that direct action to create jobs continues to be essential and young people are the priority. Therefore, a large portion of the government's job-creation expenditures will be devoted to unemployed youth, and these programs will be delivered more effectively. Using re-allocated and new resources, a $1 billion Youth Opportunity Fund will assist young Canadians in acquiring new skills and in finding jobs in the private, voluntary and public sectors. In particular, substantial resources from this fund will be allotted to a career access program which encourages the private sector to provide work and training for those entering the work force for the first time. To intensify the government's efforts for young Canadians, a minister of state for youth will be appointed.

The federal government's leadership with its six-and-five program, in conjunction with the Bank of Canada's cautious monetary policy, has succeeded in halving the 10 per cent inflation that was affecting us in 1979. In October 1983, the inflation rate, as measured by the percentage change in the consumer price index from the same month the year previous, was 4.9 per cent. This was the lowest increase in consumer prices since the 4.7 per cent increase observed in August 1972. The inflation rate of food prices, which had reached 18 per cent annually in early 1979, is now in the order of 4 per cent. The prices of goods and services in general, which were increasing by 14 per cent in 1981, are now stabilized at an inflation rate of 5.2 per cent as of October 1983. Thus, one of the most positive developments in the Canadian economy in 1983 has been the success in the battle against inflation.

Another positive development in 1983 has been the lower interest rates that have prevailed on the Canadian capital markets. While a large number of people would have preferred that the government establish artificially low domestic interest rates, these people forget that the Canadian capital markets are closely linked to the international markets, especially the American capital market. Artificially low interest rates would have resulted in capital outflows from the Canadian economy and would have discouraged capital inflows into Canada. On the one hand, this would have jeopardized the current economic recovery and, on the other hand, it would have lowered the value of the Canadian dollar, which would have increased the costs of our imports and contributed to a refuelling of inflation. High inflation results in even higher interest rates, since money-lending institutions want to assure themselves of an adequate return over and above the rate of inflation on the money they lend. Therefore, the way to obtain consistently low rates of interest is to first lower inflation rates. The success obtained in the battle against inflation has thus enabled the monetary authorities to reduce interest rates to half their level of two years ago, to approximately the same level as those prevailing in the United States.

In the third quarter of 1983, the Canadian economy continued its path to recovery. The gross domestic product in constant 1971 dollars increased by 1.8 per cent, to $119.4 billion from $117.2 billion, in the second quarter. Since the trough of the recession in December 1982, the output of the Canadian economy, as measured by the gross domestic product, has increased by nearly $6.3 billion, or 5.6 per cent. The 5.6 per cent growth obtained since the beginning of 1983 compares very favourably with the 2.3 per cent real growth forecast for 1983 in the federal government's April 1983 budget. If anything, this shows that the recovery is proceeding at a much faster rate than expected. This higher-than-anticipated growth has resulted in a substantial improvement in the employment situation. The major source of growth in output has been the Canadian economy's industrial production sector. In the third quarter this sector's output jumped by 4.4 per cent. This followed two substantial increases in the first two quarters of 1983. The gains in industrial output obtained since the beginning of 1983 brought the industrial production of the Canadian economy to 15.1 per cent over the low point set at the depth of the recession in December 1982. Canada's trade commissioners have embarked on an aggressive campaign to promote exports in traditional and non-traditional areas of the world. In pursuit of this objective, the Prime Minister visited a number of countries last summer in the Pacific Rim where our opportunities for increased trade are very promising.

In addition to Japan, whose economic power is well established, there is an increasing number of Asian states—such as Hong Kong, South Korea, Taiwan and Singapore—rapidly joining the ranks of industrialized countries. In addition, there are the Asian countries that, although currently in the less developed category, seem headed for rapid growth in the 1980s. The economic growth that is expected to take place in this area of the world in the coming years could lead to increased export opportunities for Canada. An example of such gains is the high growth of the Japanese economy during the 1960s and 1970s, which led our exports to that country to increase from $178 million in 1960 to $4.5 billion in 1982. Similarly, our exports to South Korea during the same period increased from $4 million to $490 million. Average growth rates of 6 to 10 per cent consistently characterized the economic performance of most of these Pacific countries during the 1970s. While the projected growth rate of these countries is expected to be somewhat lower in the 1980s, it is still expected to remain in the 5 to 8 per cent range.

While a major portion of our exports to these countries will be industrial raw materials, energy-producing commodities and foodstuffs, these countries have shown an increasing propensity to import fully manufactured Canadian products. An example of this is the purchases by South Korea of a Candu reactor and a very big telecommunications package from Northern Telecom. This propensity can reasonably be expected to be maintained as long as these countries remain in their economic take-off phases. It is interesting to note in this regard that our exports to Asia increased by nearly 9 per cent in 1982, notwithstanding the world recession.

The Canadian government has taken a number of steps to give greater impetus to some existing economic programs and initiatives. Just to mention a few, more funds will be made available for the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, for stabilizing employment in the automobile manufacturing industry, for promoting the tourist industry, for forestry research and development, and for the farming and fishing industries.

In every serious situation the eternal optimists contend that there is always a silver lining. In its early stages, the recession, in combination with high rates of inflation, caused our sense of community to deteriorate. Each major group in society sought to blame economic decline on someone else. However, later on Canadians recognized that to avert the downward spiral they needed to turn away from past divisions and work together in order to restore growth and prosperity. This new co-operative spirit has already produced tangible results, but more needs to be done.

The Minister of Finance has already begun a new round of economic consultation with provincial governments and other economic partners. A new industrial and regional development board, chaired jointly by representatives of labour and business, will be formed in order to provide practical advice on how best to implement the government's industrial policy.

Labour has been, and should continue to be, a full partner in the process of economic recovery. Workers deserve a fair share of the recovery benefits and an equal voice in the resolution of issues having to do with technological change and productivity improvements. A system of awards will be inaugurated to recognize the contribution of companies, labour organizations and individuals to Canadian productivity and competitiveness. We are seeing the dawning of a new era in labour, management and government relations.

The strength of a democracy is measured by the way it treats its minorities. I do not mean just ethnic minorities: I mean the economically destitute and the handicapped.

The government intends to introduce legislation which will increase the guaranteed income supplement for single pensioners, providing additional assistance to more than 700,000 Canadians. The entire area of pensions at retirement is under review. The government is committed to improving the adequacy and fairness of our retirement income system. It is also committed to maintaining the equitable system for payment of medical care and hospital costs built up over the past two decades. This system must not be eroded and eventually destroyed through extra charges to the sick. A new Canada Health Act will be introduced in order to clarify the objectives of the Canadian health insurance system.

There will be various amendments made to the Criminal Code allowing for stiffer penalties for drunk drivers in order to keep them off the roads.

A new provision will be introduced which will give statutory recognition to the government's policy on multiculturalism. Thus, the government completes a commitment to Canada's multicultural society which began in the summer of 1963 with the appointment of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. Our esteemed Deputy Leader of the Government was a member of that commission. The B&B commission, as it became known, had a specific mandate to inquire into, and to report upon, the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada and to recommend steps to be taken to develop the Canadian Confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races. This mandate took into account the contribution made by other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada and measures that should be taken in order to safeguard that contribution.

The fourth report of the B&B commission, which was tabled in the house in 1968, contained recommendations relating to minority groups. These recommendations led Mr. Trudeau, in 1971, to announce the policy of multiculturalism. In 1972 he appointed a Minister of State for Multiculturalism. We are very fortunate to have in this chamber today the then Minister of State for Multiculturalism. I am speaking of Senator Haidasz. In 1973 the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism was established with about 100 members who represented our ethnic and regional diversities and who advised the minister responsible with respect to what programs should be implemented in order to make multiculturalism a reality in Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Senator Bosa was the distinguished chairman of that council.

Senator Bosa: That is correct, I was chairman for three years, terminating in 1979. I do not know how distinguished a chairman I was, but I was its chairman.

The council made many recommendations, one of which was with respect to the cultural enrichment program. Many of the recommendations of the council have been implemented, including the insertion of section 27 in the Charter of Rights which allows constitutional status to multiculturalism.

Finally, while this completes the legislative part, we must ensure that the spirit of the policy is implemented. The policy of multiculturalism provides Canadians with cultural equality regardless of ethnic background. It is a policy which gives all Canadians a sense of belonging. It is the common denominator for all Canadians. It promotes national unity and instils in all Canadians a deeper feeling of Canadianism.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, yesterday in this House we heard a Throne Speech in which reference was made to the serious problems facing this country and to the new initiatives the Government intends to take over the next few months to help Canada definitely out of the recession it has suffered in recent years.

Senator Bosa, whom I commend wholeheartedly, has made some very pertinent comments on all the important aspects of the Throne Speech. As far as I am concerned, I will simply comment briefly on those initiatives which I have especially at heart.

When I first came here, almost eight months ago, an honourable senator, who unfortunately has retired since, was good enough to give me advice, including this: Be in no hurry to make your maiden speech, it would not be appreciated. And, above all, when you do make it, avoid Latin quotations. So I waited, but I never thought that when the time came, I would be given a mere 24 hours to prepare that maiden speech. I give you my word I will indulge in no Latin quotations, but I will find it hard to avoid shifting from one subject to another, for which I apologize.

Further, I have no parliamentary experience, as you know. Having never been in politics, I have never had the privilege of being a member of Parliament, a minister or even a provincial premier, as is the case with a great many honourable senators who are here today. So I have much to learn before I become familiar with the procedures, rules and practices of debate. I thank all honourable senators from both sides of the House who have so generously helped me out with such kindness and unlimited patience. Let them be reassured, I am bound to learn ultimately.

One month before being appointed, the idea of some day becoming a senator had never crossed my mind. The least I can say is this was not in my career planning. And, why try to hide it from you? I have never fought very strongly against the popular prejudices that do exist against the Senate.

However, these last few months I have had an opportunity to appreciate the great competence of most of my colleagues, the considerable amount of time spent by some of them on Senate business and especially on committee work. A number of my preconceived ideas have melted as snow under the sun.

For example, I have had time to fully appreciate our Speaker's generous availability and very great patience, to admire the work done by the Government Leader, to whom I extend my best wishes for a prompt recovery, and also by his assistant, and by the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Senator Flynn, who hopefully will come back in the best of form early in the New Year.

I must admit that I am beginning to miss his sense of humour and his boisterous laughter that has so often resounded in this dignified chamber.

Finally, I have been very much impressed by the very well prepared contributions which are the hallmark of the Acting Leader of the Opposition, Honourable Senator Roblin.

● (1550)

[English]

Whenever possible, I have attended meetings of the Joint Committee on Senate Reform—the dead committee!—and I have heard just about every criticism it is possible to level at the upper house. The astonishing thing, to me, is that only a tiny portion of the people who appeared before the committee recommended the abolition of the Senate. At the other end of the spectrum, I was equally astonished by how few people wanted to keep the status quo—a little Latin creeping in there!

Senate reform has been discussed since the day the Senate was created, but for the first time one can sense a real willingness on the part of both the government and the official opposition to carry through on a serious proposal for in-depth reform. The recommendations of the new committee will be made public some day; when those recommendations are made public, it will be evident that at least some of them will necessitate amending the Constitution. That will undoubtedly entail laborious discussions with the provinces to obtain the consent of at least seven of them, along with the approbation of at least 50 per cent of the population. That may take quite some time.

[Translation]

This is why, honourable senators, I hope that the Senate will set up immediately a special committee responsible for the immediate implementation of the numerous reforms which the Senate can undertake without any constitutional amendment.

That would be a resounding affirmation of its commitment to reform and, perhaps also a way to restore the credibility it allegedly lost a long time ago.

Now, those internal reforms on which we could agree easily, I would hope, are so numerous and would have such consequences that we could wait for other changes in all equanimity. "I am worth what I want", wrote Valéry.

Along with Canadians of all ages, I am quite pleased that a Ministry of State for Youth will be set up. Hardly a year before the International Year of Youth, this concrete gesture will be an encouragement to our young Canadians, a great number of whom are unfortunately unemployed and even sometimes on the verge of despair.

At sixty, one sometimes dreams of being 20. Personally, I would not like at all to be twenty in 1983 and belong to a generation which seems to have been forsaken by all.

To be 20 years old today is to begin life with the ever present anguish of a nuclear conflict which would jeopardize the future of mankind itself.

To be 20 years old is to be the helpless witness of the wasting of natural resources, the destruction of the environment, the population boom in Third World countries where already a third of the people are literally starving to death.

To be 20 years old is to be constantly confronted with violence which erupts almost every day in some corner of the world, Lebanon, El Salvador, Grenada, Poland, Afghanistan, Northern Ireland.

However, if I were 20 years old today, all the calamities elsewhere in the world would not prevent me, like a great number of Canadians, from complaining about the so-called disastrous situation in Canada. Without any sense of shame, I would not doubt forget that our country is one of the wealthiest in the world. Not the wealthiest but one of the most flourishing among some 160 member countries of the United Nations. Canada is endowed with an abundance of natural resources, almost unlimited space, advanced technology and highly qualified manpower.

[English]

Instead of asking ourselves whether we have a right to all these advantages, we grumble; we grumble about our government at all levels; we grumble about our salaries—which are among the highest in the world; we grumble about the rate of inflation here—which is one of the lowest in the world. We complain about the recession—from which we are beginning to recover, although not without some difficulty. In Canada, the recession has meant that we have had to consume a little less, have a little less fun, and, in some cases, do with a little less. It is true that we have a seriously high number of unemployed, but at least we have unemployment insurance, welfare benefits and health insurance—advantages unheard of in most countries of the world.

In poorer countries, a recession causes many hundreds of thousands of men, women and children to die of hunger or of easily-cured diseases. There is, undeniably, a certain difference between our problems and theirs.

[Translation]

This being said, if I were 20 years old today, I would have to admit that this great country of ours, while rich and well developed, fails to provide employment to more than a million Canadians, half of them young people.

I do not pretend that unemployment is the sole cause for anxiety among today's youth; there are many other causes, as we have just seen. However, while it is a tragedy for any individual to be unable to find a job when one wants to work, it is a much more serious problem for a young person, who feels rejected, useless, unneeded, and this at the very time he or she tries to become integrated into society.

In these circumstances, it should not come as a surprise to us if, out of sheer frustration, a number of young people turn to delinquency or stupefying addiction to alcohol and drugs.

The new initiatives announced in the Throne Speech are cause for great hopes. We are delighted to hear the government announce that "a larger portion of the Government's job creation expenditures will be devoted to unemployed youth. Using re-allocated and new resources, a $1 billion Youth Opportunity Fund will assist young Canadians in acquiring new skills and in finding jobs in the private, voluntary and public sectors".

[English]

I was very glad to see that the volunteer sector was given special mention. It is hard to see how even the total combined efforts of the federal and provincial governments together with the private sector could, in the short term, find jobs for the approximately 650,000 unemployed Canadians aged 15 to 24. Older or experienced workers are the first to be hired, while these young Canadians, either lacking experience or being qualified in areas no longer in demand, are the last to be hired. That is why it seems to me so important that the government enable young people who are interested—and there are thousands of them—to serve their community through non-governmental agencies that can use young volunteers. I am, perhaps, not in the best position to point to organizations such as Katamavik and Canada World Youth as examples, but there are others, and new ones will probably be set up to respond to the new realities.

[Translation]

Voluntarism is primarily a new school for our youth of the '80s, an initiation to the forthcoming society and a notion which young Canadians support more or less consciously: a more humane society which practises consumerism with moderation, where the economic growth takes the capacity of the environment into account and where technologies have less adverse impact on the ecology, where people are more aware of the need for moderation in their eating and drinking habits. On a planet which has become a global village, every human being would be his or her neighbour's keeper—all citizens, young and old, would get involved in the development of their country and the rest of the world.

We can never repeat too often that it is not in school that young people get their ideas about politics and society. They develop them from human, strong, concrete experiences, in a surrounding which is open, real, and where they can share responsibilities with other young people, in co-operation with grown-ups. That is why it is necessary that young people be presented with projects which are fine and noble and which call upon their generosity and enthusiasm, and to suggest effective means for them to become useful and complete citizens.

[English]

When we speak of youth, we are speaking of Canada's future, naturally. This is so vitally important that I would like to go on talking about it for a long time, at the risk of having to skimp on the other elements in the Speech from the Throne that captured my attention, but do not worry. Instead, I am going to succumb to another temptation: I am going to propose to you, honourable senators, that a special committee be established to study the problems facing young people and the solutions that could be adopted.

Canadians still remember the remarkable report Child at Risk that was published by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science in 1980. The United Nations has declared 1985 to be "International Youth Year". Wouldn't the creation of a Senate committee on youth be a major contribution by Canada to this international event? Wouldn't the work of such a committee be invaluable to the new Minister of State for Youth?

[Translation]

Unfortunately, I have very little time to express my agreement with other parts of the Throne Speech. I would have liked to explain why I feel it is necessary to "preserve medicine, increase pensions for the elderly, improve public safety, extend native rights and further protect the freedom of individuals."

After sitting for two years as co-chairman on the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee, and after reading nearly 1,500 briefs on the subject and discussing 500 of those briefs at public hearings in seventeen cities across Canada, I am delighted with the Government's decision to "reinforce Canada's identity through enhanced recognition of our cultural heritage and increased support for our creative artists by new broadcasting, telecommunications and copyright policies."

On second thought, however, I wonder whether the fundamental principle in the Throne Speech was not the government's clearly expressed intention to continue to play an active role in seeking world peace. It is true that a nuclear holocaust would make any other measures, projects and collective or individual plans entirely futile. The Government is therefore absolutely right to "devote its full resources to exploration of every possible means to restore confidence and trust to the international scene", as it is to continue to "advance proposals to slow the steady spiral of the arms race, hold the spread of nuclear weapons and create the conditions for greater security at lower levels of armament."

Further on, where it says in the Throne Speech that improving the climate among nations requires knowledge, creativity and the determination to find solutions, I am inevitably led to ponder the role the Senate might play in this activity. Considering the very substantial competence of many of our honourable senators and their considerable experience in wide-ranging areas of interest, including international affairs, I think a special committee or a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that would devote its efforts to exploring "every possible means" to restore confidence among the peoples of this earth, could, in fact, play a historical part and be assured of the gratitude of future generations, if there are to be any!

In concluding, I would like to express my pleasure at hearing the Government give the assurance that it "will maintain its commitment to overseas development aid". Thus, "Canada will achieve aid goals of 0.5 per cent of the Gross National Product by 1985, and 0.7 per cent of the GNP by the end of this decade". Unfortunately, we are still far from the objective proposed to industrialized countries by the Pearson Report fourteen years ago! At least we are on the right track.

Furthermore, I feel that Canada should play a major role in establishing a much needed North-South dialogue. It could act as a catalyst and become the conscience of the rich countries.

[English]

The only real question to be asked is the following: Does Canada deserve to play such a great role as one which could, by contagion, change the face of the world? Surely not. But history has its foibles and, through no merit of our own, has been kind to us. With just a touch of madness, we might think we were fore-ordained.

First of all, unlike most Western countries, we have no colonial past with which to reproach ourselves, and no ambitions toward power or conquest. We could make the bomb, but we do not do it; we are more the victims of the multinationals than their accomplices; and we have old democratic traditions and respect for human rights. We are not particularly racist—not yet. As Canadians of diverse ethnic origins, we get along reasonably well together, and, without being as open-armed as we might be, we have accepted a goodly number of immigrants and refugees, and our financial contribution to international development, while insufficient, is still above zero.

For all these reasons Canada is beyond a doubt one of the most respected countries in the world at the present time. People who have travelled know how much we are liked, even though we have done nothing special to deserve so much affection, admiration and confidence. The poorer countries love us, the rich countries love us. It is crazy. Why do we hesitate even one moment to "use" these good feelings people have about us in order to put ourselves resolutely in the service of the whole human community and, perhaps, justify our mainly unearned reputation?

In today's circumstances, the simple fact of being a country without a history constitutes a powerful advantage; it gives us perhaps the right, if not the duty, to involve ourselves to the hilt in contemporary history by playing a major role in it and emerging once and for all from our insignificance. As Paolo Freire said, "It's a question of little by little taking history into our own hands, so that we can make it, not suffer it."

[Translation]

Of course, the Speech from the Throne we heard yesterday in this house cannot meet the expectations of all Canadians. And yet, for a great many of them, it is a message of hope, proof that, in these difficult times, the government of our country has compassion for the most underprivileged Canadians, that it wants to help effectively those who can alter the course of events, and that in spite of everything it does not forget our brothers and sisters in the Third World who are infinitely more underprivileged than the most underprivileged among us.

That is why I am pleased, as a Quebec senator representing the very beautiful senatorial district of Wellington, to second the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne moved by my colleague Senator Bosa.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was sorry to learn yesterday that the Leader of the Government, my friend Senator Olson, has been hospitalized and will undergo surgery soon. On behalf of all members of this party, I extend to Senator Olson our best and most sincere wishes for full and prompt recovery.

To Senator Bosa I offer my warmest congratulations. Senator Bosa, like his ancestor Cicero, has a gift for making convincing pleas, particularly about peace. Because of my ancestor Cesare Alberti of Venice, good Italian blood is flowing in my veins, more rapidly in all likelihood, proud as I was to hear the senator. I must congratulate Senator Bosa on all his achievements since he made Canada his adoptive country.

To Senator Jacques Hébert I would say that we had been anxiously waiting for his first speech in the Senate. We had heard that he was a very thoughtful and competent man, and that he would make a most valuable contribution to the proceedings of the Senate. What we had heard was true. We have noted that the Speech from the Throne contains one of the ideas originally expressed by Senator Hébert; it has become the policy of the government and we will soon have a Minister of State for Youth. In the past and today still, the senator has done and is doing excellent work for young Canadians.

Senator Frith, in his new responsibilities as interim Leader, will have to respond later to what I said concerning the Throne Speech. I have no doubt he will discharge that duty very well. I have the sad conviction he will have no great difficulty refuting what I will have said concerning the merits, the depth and the credibility of the Throne Speech. By that I mean refuting my views to his group's satisfaction.

Although I have not had the pleasure of hearing the throne speech as delivered by the Governor General, you may rest assured I have since read it carefully. I took notes, I checked certain statements and I made some comparisons. I am therefore in a position to share with the House my views on that interesting document.

But before doing so, I must say that although I am proud to accept that responsibility, I would have preferred having Senator Flynn here in good health and able to do this himself. I am happy to state that Senator Flynn is very well on his way to recovery, he feels much better and, according to his physicians, he has reason to hope he can probably be here by February next.

[English]

The debate on the Speech from the Throne in the Senate takes place in a context different from that in the House of Commons. Our vote, if we vote at all, will not determine the fate of any government. Therefore, by that fact alone, this is somewhat less of a parliamentary occasion than that which takes place in the other house. Nonetheless, it presents a most welcome opportunity to reflect on public affairs in Canada and to offer some observations on the way in which we are to go.

The Throne Speech, like the prorogation speech which preceded it by a mere seven days, is a wide-ranging document and it is as full of promises as a pudding is full of plums. However, I confess that there are many passages in that document which had a familiar ring; it was almost as though I had heard some of them before. There were not only echoes of the prorogation speech of seven days ago, but also faint reverberations that come down to me from the Throne Speech of 1980 itself. It seems to me that this Throne Speech can best be understood in the context of its relationship to the Throne Speech of 1980 and, particularly, to the prorogation speech that we heard a short while ago. It is perhaps part two of an exercise by which the government puts its best foot forward, and who can blame them for that because they are in need of a best foot these days. I have to issue a caution that as I read the prorogation speech and as I read this Speech from the Throne, both of them are highly selective documents. But when they are read together, they can be read with profit, not only for what they contain, but for what they fail to contain. They provide for those who wish to learn a profile of this administration which is now proceeding to its final days.

I want to start, and I think it is appropriate that I should, on a constructive note because there are always things in any government program which many people find attractive and agreeable. The first theme that is expressed in the Throne Speech deserves our widespread support, that is, the theme that expresses the desire for peace—the peace initiative—and the several proposals which are put forward in this speech as to how we may carry our progress toward that goal more effectively in the time to come. This carries the hope of mankind. I could not have expressed as eloquently and as impressively as Senator Hébert did the reasons why we Canadians have a special responsibility to take this part of our duty to ourselves and to the world seriously, indeed.

Parliamentarians may regret that for reasons which entirely escape me, it was decided to announce the new initiatives of the government at a political fund-raising dinner when it would have been more appropriate, I think, to have expressed them first in Parliament and to have endeavoured to secure the wide parliamentary support which I think they deserve. But let us put that to one side. The object is peace, and we stand for peace. It is a noble pursuit and we must hope that the outcome will be productive.

When you come to the second theme that the government has encompassed in the Throne Speech, the one dealing with the question of economic growth, then I am afraid that I cannot be quite as complimentary as I have been thus far. If it is subjected to any sort of critical examination at all, then I think serious issues of credibility arise. Can we believe what we hear? Can we trust what we read? We recognize these familiar noises which I spoke of previously. We have heard a great deal of this before and the task of the opposition and, indeed, the people of Canada, in reading this Throne Speech, is to separate the appearance from the reality. That seems to me a task to which this house could well devote itself.

Of course, promises in Throne Speeches are expected. Promises and Throne Speeches go together, particularly when they are preceding a general election. There is something in it for everybody and, therefore, I suppose everybody should be happy. But there are certain tests that should be applied to a document like this—the tests of credibility and performance. Here is where we return to the prorogation speech, because that speech outlined the record of performance of this government as they would like it to appear. I think it presents a sharp contrast not only when compared with the throne speech of 1980 but with the Throne Speech of 1983. In fact, as you analyze these two documents placed before the house in the past week, the prorogation speech and the Throne Speech, I think they pretty well give the government's hand away.

In its prorogation speech, the government had something to say about the economy that is perhaps worth reading to you now. Under the subheading "Meeting the Challenges of World Recession" the following appears in the prorogation speech:

The Canadian response to these troubled times has been, not to retrench, but to meet these greater challenges through a more effective mobilization of our resources. The Government took steps to protect Canadians as much as possible from the ravages of international recession, and to battle domestic inflation.

They come along again in the Throne Speech and deal with the same topic to encourage economic growth so that more Canadians can own a home, learn a trade, expand a business, participate in the ownership of our resources; and gain a fair share of the abundant benefits that this country can provide. I think any politician could have written that with a clear conscience. But whether or not people will agree with the sentiments as expressed when compared with what happens is something else again. The same kinds of sentiment were expressed in the Throne Speech of 1980.

In the Prorogation Speech of 1983, all mention of the sad times we have experienced since this government came to power was tactfully omitted. Listening to the Prorogation Speech and listening to the Throne Speech, no one would believe that this administration has presided over an economic débacle without equal in the history of this country in the last 40 years—since World War II. No one would believe that Canada suffered the greatest decline in gross national product of any of the seven western industrialized nations during the 1981-82 recession and that Canada's decline was more than twice as bad as that of Italy, the next worst. Those figures may be extracted from the economic review of the Department of Finance issued in April 1983.

When you reproach them for their economic policy, the standard defence of the government is to blame someone else, either Europe or the United States—and mostly the United States. Yet, what do the figures tell us? A much different story. Our inflation today is 4.9 per cent. That is a tremendous improvement over what it was, so let us be grateful for it, but it is double the inflation in the United States which competes with us for our domestic market and in whose market our exporters have to compete. Unemployment has been higher and is still higher in Canada, percentage-wise, than it is in the United States. Since 1980, Canadian job totals increased by 1.5 per cent; over the same period in the United States they increased by 3.5 per cent—again more than double. In terms of productivity, in 1982 Canada was the worst of the seven major industrial countries and worse than any of the 11 countries of the European Economic Community. In other aspects of economic measurement which are important, such as our manufacturing capacity, we cannot keep up to the United States.

In all these issues we can admit that Canada is greatly affected by what goes on in the rest of the world. Let us not try to minimize that, because it is true, but how can we explain why we do so much worse and particularly worse than our neighbour, our principal economic partner, the United States? We must be doing something wrong ourselves; we cannot attribute it to the economic troubles of the great wide world.

I want to underline that the Canadian government is part of the problem; and the people of Canada know it. Last summer the Conference Board of Canada conducted a survey. It asked 1,000 Canadian businesses the following question: Which, if any, of the following do you expect to have an adverse effect on your production six months from now? The main factor, as indicated by the survey, was the weak market demand, which is exactly what one would expect. However, the second biggest factor, cited by 36 per cent of the respondents, was government policy. In the business community of this nation, the government is seen not as the solver of the problems, but as part of the problem.

Canadian economic policy, no matter how you have examined it in the past, does not represent a very hopeful forecast of what we may expect in the future. There is little credibility in the economic and fiscal policies this government has been following. They have not been wise policies. They have not minimized the effect of the international depression on us. They have exacerbated the difficulties in which this country finds itself. They are not hopeful for the future, and, insofar as the Throne Speech says anything about this—which is of other than a patchwork or makeshift character—they have no real appeal as being helpful in solving the problems with which we find ourselves faced.

That is certainly a sad situation because while Canada should occupy a very competitive position in the international trading world, we are, in fact, very weak in the international trading world. We do not see in this Throne Speech those long-term policies that are required if we are to haul ourselves out of the slough of despond in which we find ourselves.

What about financial management? What about the way in which the government runs itself? The government has awarded itself very good marks for financial management. If you read the Prorogation Speech, you will see what they think about themselves; it is rather flattering. They think that they have been doing a pretty good job. The Prorogation Speech states:

Improved management practices were implemented generating 122 million dollars in recurring annual savings; opportunities for realizing further annual savings of 139 million dollars have also been identified. Many of the recommendations of the Lambert Commission on Financial Management and Accountability were adopted.

Here is the punch line—

As a result of these efforts, the Government's "real", or inflation-adjusted, non-defence operating and capital expenditures are at the same level now that they were six years ago.

Interesting; it implies that the government's financial record is good and that the fiscal affairs of this country are in good order. From reading this government report on its stewardship since the last general election, one would not think that, in fact, the managers of the government finances have worked themselves into a fiscal bind of almost iron limitations when they seek to devise new policies that might help the country.

[Senator Roblin.]

They have no elbow room; nowhere to go. We can see from this Throne Speech just how limited they find themselves because of that bad management.

Why is this the case? Because of the things they did not mention. What became of the deficit? What became of the debt? What became of the interest charges that the government has to carry? Not even an honourable mention in either the Prorogation Speech or in the Throne Speech. I call that something less than realistic and something less than candid in view of the situation in which we find ourselves. The government gives itself a good mark for financial management by leaving out the things that count.

One tax dollar out of every three goes to pay interest. That was not mentioned in either of these statements. The biggest growth factor in our public finance is interest on the public debt, and it did not even receive a cursory acknowledgement in either of these statements.

The deficit in 1983-84 is 8.9 per cent of the GNP. That is so horrendous that, by comparison, it makes the Americans look as if they are splendid financial managers.

Since 1980, when this Parliament began, the net debt has more than doubled from $69 billion in 1980 to $151 billion in March 1983. Yet, these vital measurements of financial probity and good management are ignored in both the Prorogation Speech and in the Throne Speech.

In 1980 the Throne Speech committed the government to continuing the policies of expenditure restraint. Just how much weight did they place in this undertaking? Federal spending has risen from $62.8 billion in 1980-81 to $100.1 billion in 1983-84. That's the policy of expenditure restraint for you. I shudder to think what it would be like if they decided to cut loose; the results would be inconceivable.

The 1980 Throne Speech committed the government to reduce the deficit in a planned and orderly manner. The fact is the deficit rose from $12.6 billion in 1980-81 to $31.3 billion in 1983-84.

Hon. Lowell Murray: And no end in sight.

• (1630)

Senator Roblin: "And no end in sight," my friend says, and he is absolutely right.

What are we to make of that? What are we to make of a claim of good government or a claim that its financial house is in order? Honourable senators, this is what was said in the Throne Speech: that the government will continue with stimulating job creation.

While stimulating job creation, the Government will hold to a fiscal policy track which will contain and then curb the federal deficit as recovery strengthens.

I think one could place about the same amount of credence in that pious hope as one could in the statement that was made in 1980, which has been so sadly belied by the facts disclosed by the government itself. Are these people good economic managers, entitled to go once more to the electorate for an expression of confidence? I think not. When it comes to management of the economy, the mark is failure. When it comes to the management of government internal finance, the mark is failure.

Honourable senators, let us look at one or two other things that are of some importance in this issue. Let us look at the question of the youth—the young unemployed people of this country, about which Senator Hébert made some interesting and constructive remarks. I must say that the government statement about youth is one of those passages which, somehow or other, we seem to have heard before. In the Prorogation Speech, dealing with the record of the government since the last speech in 1980, this was said:

Young people have also been a particular focus for Government action, which dealt with the primary concerns of youth employment and academic prospects.

Well, that is nice to know. I am glad I was told, because if I looked around this country today I would find it difficult to see the evidence of this concern that would meet my idea of what an appropriate policy response ought to be.

In the Throne Speech there is more of the same. We are told in the Throne Speech, for example, that there is going to be $1 billion expended in special efforts to help the young people of this country. When that sum is broken down a little and subjected to some analysis, however, it does not look quite as good as it sounds. Of that $1 billion, $690 million—nearly 70 per cent—is going to be recycled money—that is, money taken from something else. What else we do not know, there is no indication of that, but certainly somebody is going to get it in the neck if they are going to lose nearly $700 million to put into this program. Fifty million dollars is to come from the unemployment insurance fund—a fund which already stands at a deficit of $4.2 billion, if you please. Another $50 million will be added to that deficit, because it seems that that kind of figure does not bother the government. We know that unemployment insurance has heretofore been paid mainly by wage tax and by employers' contributions; that it is one of the most regressive forms of taxation that we have; that it adds to the cost of living; that it is one of these administrative prices the government says it is going to control, yet it is going to raid that fund for $50 million.

Let us give the government credit for this: there is another $260 million in new money that will go into these programs. The figures that I am about to quote to honourable senators were released yesterday, I believe, by the Minister of Finance. Youth unemployment for both sexes at November last was at a rate of 18.8 per cent. For young men from ages 15 to 25, there was an unemployment rate of 21.3 per cent—one in five was unemployed. Have they ever been hired? I think not. There are 400,000 young Canadians who are jobless today.

Honourable senators, $1 billion may sound good, even as a gross figure, but I think that it sounded just as good the last time we heard it. It sounded just as good when the honourable minister, Mr. Axworthy, in April of 1983 proposed the $1 billion plan during his tenure in that office. I suspect that the only thing that has changed between then and now is the minister. We have a new one and he has to have his own $1 billion program, even if there is very little change in the policy that the government has enunciated.

Honourable senators, on the basis of the record of the administration in its first session of Parliament, one is not really encouraged to think that there is much good to come of this. We have to hope that there will be. We have to hope that some of these measures, at least, will be effected. We have to hope that the government really is seized of the seriousness of the matter and that some good will come of these things. I do not decry them because I want to score a point; I decry them because I think they are inadequate. If we are to have the conservation corps and the parks and the voluntary sector increased through government action in order to employ people, that has to be a good thing and the more the merrier. I hope that it goes ahead full steam. But one thing is certain: these measures are short-term. Another thing is certain: they are not permanent jobs. And there is one probability, and that is that for many, they may be dead-end jobs. That really is the kind of patchwork and temporizing policy which one really cannot support. It seems to be devised solely to get the government over the next election, and possibly it may be of assistance. It seems to me, however, that the public is going to ask: "Where are the long-term policies that will help put this country's economic affairs to right? Where are the long-term policies that will make us quick and adaptable and ready for changes to meet the demands of the second half of the twentieth century and the competition of our international rivals?"

Honourable senators, I like to be hopeful but I have to be sceptical because, after all, I have the record to go by. It certainly is pretty cold comfort, indeed.

Let us move on to something else, honourable senators. Let us take a look at the national energy policy. On a reading of the Prorogation Speech, that is another bold initiative. There were four such initiatives mentioned: the Constitution; the six-and-five program, on the backs of the civil service, whether you like it or not; the Crow—why anyone should want to talk about the Crow when he has to eat it is something I do not understand, but that is what is going to happen in western Canada as far as my honourable friends are concerned—and the national energy policy. I want to talk about this bold initiative, the national energy policy, and I want to begin with what was said about it in the Prorogation Speech: "Energy Security at a Fair Price."

A blended, made-in-Canada oil price, fair to producers and consumers, has resulted in average wellhead prices significantly below world levels.

It goes on to say:

The commitment made in 1980 not to impose an 18¢ increase in the excise tax on transportation fuels has been honoured.

I have to admit, honourable senators, that that is literally correct. It is true that an 18 cent increase in the excise tax was not imposed. The government felt that what it had done in 1980 was so good that it would come along in the Throne Speech and re-endorse it. In that speech we read:

The Government will continue its strong commitment to the NEP in order to ensure that our goals are reached.

"Our goals are reached," indeed! One would never take it from this that the government has brought one of Canada's strongest natural resource industries to its financial knees, with questionable advantage—questionable advantage to the public interest, to fair prices or to Canadian ownership.

Senator Murray: Or to self-sufficiency!

Senator Roblin: Self-sufficiency, these days, is the product of the depression more than anything else, but I want to talk about ownership.

In 1980, Canadian ownership of this industry was 18.7 per cent. In 1982, it was 26.2 per cent, a substantial increase. Look at what was to happen. In 1982, the Canadian-controlled firms were in trouble. Companies making up that 26.2 per cent were wallowing in debt, losing money, paying huge interest charges and dipping into retained earnings to pay dividends. Honourable senators have only to take a look at the stock exchange if they want any validation of that fact. Canadian-controlled companies lost $54 million in 1982 as compared to a profit of $1.2 billion in 1981. Canadian companies involved in the acquisition of foreign firms lost more than $600 million in 1982 after registering a profit of $500 million in 1981. Those are not figures that I have composed myself, honourable senators, but are figures that are presented to us by the Petroleum Monitoring Agency. I think that members of the government will be aware of what that government body has to do. That is what their own monitoring agency tells us about what has happened in the oil industry.

Today the city of Calgary is an economic basket case and the province of Alberta is probably in the worst economic condition of any of the provinces of this country. Let me say this for the record: We see the government slowly backing away from the worst features of its national energy policy, compelled to do so, as it has been, not by good judgment but by the international oil price situation in the world today. But the damage has been done. So much for the big help to the Canadian oil industry. What about fair prices to the consumer? Well, the 18 cent excise tax was not put on, that's true; but in none of the documents that the government has paraded, in none of the statements that the government has requested His Excellency the Governor General to make, either in the Prorogation Speech or the Throne Speech, is there mention of any of the taxes they have introduced. They have invented new ones that we had not heard of before. The government should take some pride in originality. There are new taxes, other taxes, which are twice, three times, four times the 18 cents, of which figure the government is so proud and which was mentioned in the Throne Speech.

What about this "made in Canada" price that was promised to the people of Canada, to protect them from the ravages of whatever, by the grace, virtue and wise management of this administration? What about that "made in Canada" price on gasoline? Oh yes, the price at the wellhead is down, but that is not the price that the car owner pays—not by a long chalk. Pump prices—that is, what the public pay—tell another story. In December 1983, this very month, regular unleaded gasoline, calculated in Canadian gallons and in Canadian dollars, in the city of Winnipeg, from where I come, posted a price of $2.20 per gallon. If I took the trouble to motor a little way south into the United States, to the city of Minneapolis, that same gallon, measured in the Canadian style, priced in Canadian dollars, was $1.74, a difference of 54 cents per gallon cheaper in the United States. What price the "made in Canada" gasoline policy? If one is from Toronto, like my honourable friend, Senator Bosa, the price of gasoline there, on the fifth of this month, for self-service, regular unleaded, measured in Canadian gallons and paid for in Canadian dollars, was $2.15. If one decided to take a little run over to Buffalo, one could buy the same product, the same quantity, with the same currency, for $1.79, 36 cents cheaper.

Senator Bosa: There is an ad valorem tax.

Senator Roblin: Nevertheless, those are the prices that are being paid. And the impression the government wants to leave with everyone who buys gasoline is that they have saved them from a terrific increase in prices. There is an ad valorem tax also in the United States, as the honourable senator knows perfectly well. So it goes. But I shall not delay the house much longer, although further examples could be examined.

However, if honourable senators want to understand what is contained in the 1983 Throne Speech and how much they can count on it, they had better measure the government's performance since 1980; and that performance and that record is eloquent, and it inspires little confidence in the present administration. On the basis of experience, the promises that are in the 1983 Throne Speech will be recognized for what they are, namely, election fodder. They strain the credibility of the government, and they certainly strain the credulity of the Canadian public.

However, I would not have honourable senators think that things do not change in this nation. They do. I have been encouraged to find there are new voices of protest against the present administration, voices that were formerly submerged and not able to make their views known—or so they seem to think. Those are voices of men who should know, and they should know because they are ex-cabinet ministers in this administration. So far we have heard from four of them.

An Hon. Senator: What do they say?

Senator Roblin: Well, I will tell you what they say. Senator Perrault has already spoken, and, as he is a member of this house, if he wishes to repeat what he said elsewhere, we will give him the opportunity and the privilege of doing so. I was particularly taken, or perhaps I should say shocked, by the statement of the Honourable James Fleming who was a cabinet minister in this administration. He describes the policy and practice of the present government as a combination of cynicism, ballyhoo and manipulation. Well now, as the Honourable

Mr. Fleming is the ex-P.R. Flack for this administration, he speaks with a certain authority.

Senator Frith: It takes one to know one.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend may be speaking for himself, but he is not speaking for me. I repeat, a combination of cynicism, ballyhoo and manipulation. That is the charge. I have never used such harsh words. Perhaps I might have wished to, but I have never done so. They seem appropriate today, however. Are they sour grapes? They may be, but that does not make them untrue.

Fortunately, we are witnessing the last days of this administration. It is an administration whose credibility is forfeit, whose performance is lacking, whose fund of progressive ideas to inspire Canadians to put their country back into that state of competence and good heart which used to be its birthright is limited; an administration which seems to be lacking in that will to live, perhaps. It knows that its time has come, and it is writ large in the documents that have been placed before this house. It will take more than the Throne Speech to save the government, and if the government had 10 Throne Speeches, I do not believe it would do the job. For all the good they are attempting to do, I believe the people of this country will be content to see them go, because they know that that good amounts to very little. The nation needs a new start. It needs new hope, and it will take a change of government to get it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: With some confidence, that is what I believe the people of Canada are looking forward to, and I might say, honourable senators, I too look forward to that.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will no doubt wish that Senator Olson were here to participate in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. As honourable senators will no doubt know, tests showed that Senator Olson should undergo an operation on his heart. The operation, which is being performed at the Ottawa Civic Hospital, is now almost routine because of the expertise of the team led by Dr. Keon who performs the surgery. Therefore, I am happy to tell honourable senators that the prognosis is favourable, and others of our colleagues can attest to the competence of that surgical team. I know that Senator Olson would wish to be here, and there is a very good chance that he will be able to return to the chamber when we resume in January.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: I echo the sentiments expressed at the continued regrettable absence from the chamber of Senator Flynn. I am encouraged, as are all honourable senators, by the observation of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that progress is being made and that Senator Flynn may return to the Senate about the same time as Senator Olson.

It is my purpose to comment on the government's position as reflected in the Speech from the Throne. To some extent, the Speech from the Throne speaks for itself; it is quite detailed. My job is made easier by the procedural good luck that I speak after the mover, the seconder and the Leader of the Opposition, and because Senators Bosa, Hébert and Roblin have contributed in a very detailed and eloquent way to the debate on the subject. I compliment them all on their interventions.

• (1650)

Honourable senators, what does the Speech from the Throne purport to do?

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Not much!

Senator Frith: A great deal. It reflects the government's efforts to recognize the expectations and concerns in the minds and the hearts of all Canadians, and it isolates, identifies and attempts to deal with those concerns, not in high-sounding rhetorical terms but in terms of specific, building bricks to the programs. What are those concerns as reflected in the main themes?

[Translation]

Here are the five major themes: First, seeking new avenues to world peace. And I could suggest that we examine those themes within the context of the very specific efforts made by the government to identify the problems and propose solutions. Second, promoting economic growth. Third, creating a new alliance between business, labour, government and other groups. Fourth, strengthening the safety net. And fifth, pursuing our Canadian identity.

[English]

Those are the five principal areas that the government feels are properly the concerns of the people and must be dealt with, and the government proposes to do so in the way it outlines.

What can we say about the first concern? Certainly not much more than has been said by Senator Bosa, Senator Hébert and Senator Roblin. In the present context, it is almost trite to say that in the search for peace the role that Canada has to play, as precisely identified by Senator Hébert, is the turning to the advantage of all the citizens of the world the fact that, earned or not, we enjoy a reputation—a reputation, we are often told, based on the fact that we have never been a colonial power and we have never sought to dominate other peoples. How can we turn that to our advantage? What can one say about the need for that search for world peace when, considering present weaponry, it seems almost to cheapen the subject even to talk about it in terms that do not really beggar the absolutely awesome nature of the first theme of this Throne Speech? Senator Hébert said that this is a much needed theme for the people of the world as a potential message of hope.

In essence, its basic theme is peace and prosperity. In spite of the awesome nature of any attempt to deal with the problem of world peace, we must try to do something of a practical nature, and the government is doing so. For example, it concretely proposes, in the first theme, the devotion of full resources to restore confidence and trust in the international scene by continuing to advance proposals to slow the arms race. There is almost complete non-partisan support for the initiatives to fulfill obligations to NATO and NORAD, as has been emphasized already, with conventional weaponry, not nuclear weaponry; for renewed attention to Canadian peace-keeping operations under the United Nations; for the creation of a public-funded centre to gather, collate and digest information concerning defence and arms control. There is also wide-ranging support for increased funding for voluntary organizations, so that we engage all the people of Canada in this initiative and private research groups engaged in the security arms control and disarmament issues.

A problem with reference to disarmament that we hear about almost every week is the stumbling block of the verification procedures, which no one seems to be able to agree upon. The proposal is to create resources for the development of verification procedures and thereby play that role in terms of initiatives that Canada is particularly well suited to take in helping in arms talks and arms reduction talks.

Canada enjoys a reputation as a Samaritan state in terms of foreign aid. That reputation is part of its status in international affairs which gives it the opportunity to play this unique role in the search for peace. The proposal is to increase the aid goals to 0.5 per cent of the GNP by 1985 and to 0.7 per cent by 1990, short of the Pearson proposal, as underlined by Senator Hébert. The amount at present is about 0.42 per cent, so the planned increases are significant.

Honourable senators, we come to the second theme, the opportunities for growth. Senator Roblin, as is his duty, emphasized what he feels are the omissions from the Speech from the Throne as government proposals. In general terms, my difficulty with Senator Roblin's remarks is that, while he may think there is very little new in the Throne Speech, I heard very little that was new from his party in its criticism of this government's performance. The recovery—and this may be the cause of some disappointment to the opposition party—has worked and is working. So when we talk about significant omissions from the Speech from the Throne, we should balance that by noticing the significant omissions of emphasis, on the part of the opposition, on the fact that the six-and-five program has worked. When the program was introduced very few people believed it would work. Certainly, the opposition did not believe it would work. However, that restraint program, as led by the federal government, has worked. But if critics of the government are confronted with the fact that the program has worked—

Hon. Lowell Murray: We still have a higher rate of inflation than our trading partners.

● (1700)

With respect to the performance of the government, figures have been quoted. Everyone can find his own figures to support any view he wishes to put forward. With respect to the Speech from the Throne, interlaced in Senator Roblin's comments was the suggestion that the people of Canada are totally dissatisfied with what this government has done and with the Speech from the Throne.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Murray: Was a new Goldfarb poll conducted?

Senator Frith: Yes, there was a poll with respect to satisfaction with the performance of the government. Perhaps honourable senators noticed that poll, which was released about a month ago. The results were totally inconsistent with the voting intention at the time. The figures were the largest percentages I have ever seen in terms of satisfaction with the performance of the government.

Senator Murray: What is that, 27 per cent?

Senator Frith: No, much better than 27 per cent. In fact, better than I have ever seen in terms of satisfaction with the performance of any government.

Let us consider business. We are told that businesses are terribly disappointed with the performance of this government and the Speech from the Throne. As Senator Murray always says when he quotes from any organization's statement, I listened to a very distinguished, totally independent and non-partisan spokesman, namely, the spokesman for the Business Council on National Issues. Let me inform honourable senators what that council consists of. Its membership is comprised of the chief executive officers from approximately 150 of the country's largest corporations. It is a totally non-political organization. This morning on “Canada AM” the council's spokesman, Thomas D'Aquino, was interviewed, and I made some notes of what he had to say. He was introduced as another person who would gripe about the government's performance and the Speech from the Throne. Apparently, the people from “Canada AM” had not talked to him in advance; they were sure he would join their parade of criticism. However, to their great disappointment, he did not.

What did he have to say? He said that he was very happy with the consultations with business and labour. He said that his organization believes that the government is serious with respect to consultation. He also said that there has been an enormous improvement in the last eight months. According to the opposition, no one is supposed to believe in this government. We have heard all about its bad record and how people are so dissatisfied with it. Yet this man says there has been an enormous improvement in the last eight months.

He pointed out that economic progress started under this government and that it is continuing. He was pleased that no new vast sums of money were provided to stimulate the economy because that would have short-circuited recovery. This Canadian, speaking on behalf of these 150 corporations, said that the promises will not jeopardize the recovery process. These are the promises that we have heard about as being unsatisfactory and causing great dissatisfaction among Canadians.

He went on to say that the new expenditures were limited and he was pleased, therefore, that the government is not abandoning its restraint policy. The government is creating jobs, he said—creating jobs the way this government means to create them. This is not the way the NDP would create jobs, nor how the opposition would create them. Apparently, we will never be told what the opposition will do about this situation until they form a government. Since we know that is not very likely to happen, probably all of us will have retired from the Senate by the time they inform us what it is they would have done.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, listen to this. Mr. D'Aquino said that this government is creating jobs and putting business back on its feet. That is the way in which this government has always proposed to create jobs; it is the way this government has always proposed to stimulate the economy. It will not step in with fast-spending programs and nationalization of industries as the NDP proposes. As I have said already we do not know how the Conservative Party would carry out this task since they are not willing to tell us.

This government has always said that the recovery of the economy depends upon the private sector. The Liberal Party has always believed in a mixed economy. Therefore, the Throne Speech is consistent with the tradition of this party, is consistent with the policies of this government, and is apparently satisfying business leaders that, indeed, the government is putting business back on its feet. This is the long-term approach to job creation. We have been told that some of these proposals are short-term and, indeed, they are. They are meant to be short-term and it is not pretended that they are anything more.

Honourable senators, I tell you the other government proposals for economic recovery are long-term. The business community knows this and is in full support of it.

There has been no significant increase in the deficit, and again that is to the satisfaction of the business community. Mr. D'Aquino also said that in general the government is on the right track. Does this reflect the dissatisfaction of Canadians, as we have heard from Senator Roblin?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: With respect to the second theme, opportunity for growth, youth, the opposition knows, is the focal point. We know that the members of the opposition support us in that respect. I congratulate them for their ability to perceive that that is the problem area. They have been telling us about it and we have been listening. We have also been talking about it. The focus must be on youth, since that is the group on which, in terms of unemployment, the most emphasis is placed and for which there is an unacceptably high rate of unemployment.

What does the government propose to do about this situation? I do not know whether many senators heard the Minister of Employment and Immigration speak this morning. He pointed out that very often our young people find it particularly difficult to obtain their first job. That is a factual statement supported by research. It is the reason a great many of these proposals relate to hyping up the ability of the young to gain jobs—to gain that first job. It has been found that when they do obtain that first job, they can retain it, but they also find it much easier to move into another job. Consequently, a large proportion of job creation expenditures will go to youth and the program will be delivered more effectively. The youth opportunity fund consisting of about $1 billion will go to assist young Canadians in finding jobs in the public, private and voluntary sectors.

A minister of state responsible for youth will be appointed. We in this chamber may take some satisfaction from the fact that our colleague, Senator Hébert, made a proposal in this respect at a Liberal caucus in Quebec. Obviously, his idea has caught fire and is receiving support from across the land. I am sure I speak for my colleagues when I say how much satisfaction we derive from the fact that one of our newer senators, Senator Hébert, is, in a sense, the father of this policy and of this item in the Throne Speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators may look to the Throne Speech for verification of what Mr. D'Aquino said about the jobs that have been created. Senator Bosa also spoke about this. He pointed out that, since December of 1982 some 353,000 new jobs have been created as a result of a $5 billion stimulus provided in the April 1983 budget.

Honourable senators, again with respect to the question of credibility, we have been told without detail that the government has lost credibility because it has not fulfilled its obligations undertaken in the Speech from the Throne in 1980. No figures have been provided in this regard. In order to provide opposition senators and others with an opportunity to deal with this situation in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I may seek leave, at a later date, to have included in Debates of the Senate a comparison of the promises made in 1980 and the promises delivered. I would quote selectively from it, were I to use it now. However, I do not want to do so at this time. If it appears in Debates of the Senate at a later date it will enable the opposition and others to take shots at it.

Senator Murray: Perhaps you would identify the author of this study?

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Murray: Then who is the author?

Senator Frith: There is no author; it is a study that was done by some journalists.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Perhaps I could interject here. There would be no objection to your incorporating that study as part of your own speech. However, there would be objection to your tabling it as something separate.

Senator Frith: Senator Macdonald is quite correct in emphasizing that it is not to be considered a document tabled. It could simply be considered as part of my speech and could be attacked as pure rhetoric, if any honourable senator wished to do so.

In any event, its credibility can be discussed on another occasion; honourable senators will have a chance to see what the performance was and just how well the government fulfilled its obligations and the undertakings it gave at that time.

I do not want to say anything further about jobs, simply because that matter has already been spoken of. It is dealt with in the Speech. It is considered important and very specific programs are given to deal with it, with the price tags attached; they are right out there, up front with no fuzzy words, no fuzzy figures. This is exactly what the government proposes to do, and it is there to be examined by the people of Canada and, of course, by honourable senators.

Senator Murray: According to Mr. Lalonde, what is the projected rate of unemployment for the next year?

Senator Frith: You will have to ask Mr. Lalonde.

Senator Murray: He has already said what it is. There is not going to be any specific—

Senator Frith: Then if you know, I am sure it will form a part of your speech.

These are the solutions to these problems. I know they will have an effect on the unemployment rate. However, I am not in the business of making predictions. If you want to know what the odds are, phone Nick the Greek in Las Vegas.

Before leaving the question of our economic growth, I want to talk about another very important part of the economic program, the building of regional strengths. Already, as honourable senators know because of legislation that has been passed here in the Senate, there are programs and federal funding with respect to the re-organization of the Industrial and Regional Development Program. Recovery is taking place because we are taking maximum advantage of the strengths and attributes of each particular region through a formula devised for this particular purpose. The Speech from the Throne here is also launching a new era of federal-provincial planning and consultation. Negotiations are under way to sign comprehensive economic and regional development programs.

With respect to an aggressive trade drive, honourable senators will have heard through the media that Mr. de Grandpré has suggested to the MacDonald Commission that we must be more aggressive, more efficient in our international trade activities and generally in our business activities. Here, again, there are specific, clear, detailed programs for an aggressive trade drive. There are programs to extend export development to support service industries and encourage private trading houses. The Customs Act will be streamlined and modernized. Duty-free export zones will be established for manufacturing and processing in bond of goods for export. There will be a pursuit of world product mandate, which is very important and, as you know, has already taken place in some areas in Canada, particularly with reference to subsidiaries of multinational corporations. When a subsidiary of a company, such as 3-M, is given a world product mandate, that means that all the work for that company's product, for sale around the world, will be done here in Canada.

Then there is Pacific Rim trade, which will be facilitated through the establishment of the Asia Pacific Foundation of Canada and the expansion and improvement of relations with the United States.

[Senator Frith.]

On the subject of world-class industries and with a view to pushing even further our favourable trade balance, there is planned legislation with regard to R&D tax incentives, and there are additional steps to implement technology policy. With respect to the automobile industry, which is a subject of great concern, particularly here in central Canada, there is the Canada-Japan Auto Agreement for additional production facilities and parts procurement in Canada. As honourable senators will recall from the task force report on the automobile industry, the unions and government recommended the implementation of a Canadian content test or criterion. That, in turn, has led to negotiations with Japan towards the establishment of the Canada-Japan Auto Agreement.

There is planning for industrial reconstruction and new investment based on a labour-business-government consensus, and an expanded "Shop Canadian" program for small business. There are also detailed proposals, as we have heard, for a Canada Rail pass as an effort to increase tourism. We are all aware of the effect of the tourist dollar on our trade balance. That will also be the subject of attention in this program.

Then on the subject of resources, the Speech from the Throne goes into detail regarding the upgrading of fishing, forestry, mining and agriculture. Some $200 million will be allotted to improve fish grading and freezer facilities; there will be funds for the Fishing Vessel Assistance Program, and some attention will be given to the Pacific Fishery. With respect to forests, there is a renewal strategy extended through Environment 2000 with additional funding for forestry R&D.

With respect to food, a livestock stabilization program is proposed, as well as a National Farm Products Marketing Council. There is also proposed a Commission of Enquiry to study problems in potato marketing in eastern Canada. All of these details cover problems in various regions of the country.

With respect to water there are problems which, as I see it, will be with us, as citizens of the world, for some time to come. Already covetous eyes are being cast on Canada's water resources. To deal with these problems the government will expand investment in prairie and soil requirements, especially through a new hydrology laboratory in Saskatoon. Moreover, negotiations are already under way with the U.S. on the subject of acid rain. As you know, we have a very active Minister of the Environment now in Mr. Caccia, who has already shown success in that area. Efforts will be made to reduce Canadian sulphur emissions as part of our negotiations with the United States on acid rain.

With respect to energy, as Senator Roblin has underlined, the government is committed to the NEP. Perhaps we shall find out whether the opposition, the Conservative Party, if ever they are elected, will make as clear and unequivocal a statement.

Hon. C. William Doody: Now please do not be nasty.

Senator Frith: I am not being nasty at all. Far from it. I would look forward to hearing an unequivocal statement. It would be interesting to know whether the present leadership of the Conservative Party, if elected, would repeal the legislation dealing with the NEP. Would their policy be to dismantle the NEP; to dismantle the system of grants and incentives that are already in place? In the view of this government, a number of our fellow Canadians, who are engaged in the oil business, would be very interested to know whether there will be a change in the NEP to use a system of tax incentives rather than the grant system that presently exists. I would point out that, to take advantage of a tax incentive, there have to be some profits, and tax incentives are no substitute for a program of grants to help encourage self-sufficiency in our energy field. Perhaps, if we are lucky, we will hear whether that is their policy. We can only hope that whatever policy they bring forward is half as detailed as the programs we see in this Speech from the Throne.

There will be legislation to confirm the Canada-Nova Scotia Energy Agreement, which is detailed in the Speech from the Throne.

The third of the five headings of the Speech is Partnership for Recovery. I am sure that most people have noticed that the policy of this government is to encourage partnerships among governments, labour and management; the partnership outlined in detail in this Speech from the Throne involves a partnership of governments. In this regard, the Minister of Finance will be starting new consultations with provincial governments and other economic bodies. We have heard from Mr. D'Aquino how well the present mechanisms of consultation have been working, and new, permanent mechanisms of consultation will be introduced with regular economic-outlook conferences involving business, labour and management; these could include other interested parties, if necessary. A new industrial and regional development board will be set up to give advice on industrial policy.

There will be a new competition policy. The Speech from the Throne addresses all of those areas. A task force will be established to help co-operatives, credit unions and caisses populaires to make a greater contribution to the economy.

You will recall what was in the Speech from the Throne relating to productivity. A system of rewards will be inaugurated to recognize contributions from companies, labour organizations and individuals to Canada's productivity and competitiveness. A fund will be created for Labour Canada to support research and the new Centre for Productivity and Employment Growth.

There will also be amendments to the Canada Labour Code relating to occupational safety and health, labour standards, sexual harassment and the upgrading of standards on parental leave. There will be a consolidation under one act of occupational safety and health standards. As well, selected crown corporations will test new methods of co-operative productivity improvements.

With respect to crown corporations, legislation will be introduced to let the Canada Development Investment Corporation better manage certain crown assets. Labour representatives will be appointed to the boards of certain crown corporations, consistent with the theme of partnership. The Interchange Canada Program involving business executives and government officials will be expanded to include labour. That has been a very successful program.

With respect to the part-time work force, consultations will be carried out with provincial governments, labour and business to provide pensions and fringe benefits.

I come now to the fourth heading, Strengthening the Safety Net. While I am sure that no one in Canada would deny that the world has just gone through a serious recession, I am equally sure that no one would argue that the effect of this recession on the people of Canada was as severe as the effect of the depression of the 1930s. The reason the two eras are not really comparable is that, since the 1930s, a safety net or cushion has been built into the economy to soften the impact of these economic peaks and valleys. That device has been brought forward by a Liberal government. I am speaking of such things as social legislation, unemployment insurance, and social programs for senior citizens. All these things have been put into effect as cushions or as a safety net. The phrase chosen to describe the fourth theme, "strengthening the safety net", is well chosen because that is exactly what is proposed in the Speech from the Throne. It is proposed that that safety net, all of it woven by legislation under a Liberal administration, be strengthened.

With respect to senior citizens, legislation will be introduced to increase the Guaranteed Income Supplement for single pensioners. That will affect 700,000 Canadians. The pension system will be reformed in accordance with the findings of a Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform. Steps will be taken to strengthen both the public and private pension plans. There will be improvements in the coverage, vesting and portability of the Pension Benefits Act. The provinces will be asked to concur in changes to both the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans so that Canadians will receive comparable pensions everywhere in Canada. That, again, will strengthen the safety net.

A new Canadian health act will be introduced. During the depression, Canadians had to pay their own hospital bills. That was part of the impact of the depression. Medical bills were not paid by governments; they were paid by individuals. The new Canada health act will clarify objectives and ensure universal access to medical care. This is all included in the Speech from the Throne. There is no question about what is being proposed. It may well be that some people will find it unacceptable, but it is there and can be seen. There is no fog concealing anything.

Financial assistance will be given to the provinces with respect to hospital care. Post-secondary education will be increased by more than $500 million in order to deal with the alleged problem of the need to impose user-fees. That is over and above the $13 billion to be transferred for 1983-84.

There will be protection for homes and businesses. There will be amendments relating to the choice of mortgage instruments.

With respect to fisheries, farms and small businesses, attention will be given to the need for long-term financing. Bankruptcy laws will be revised to increase their flexibility. A system of pre-bankruptcy arbitration for farmers will be introduced and greater protection will be given to wages with respect to bankruptcy.

With respect to personal safety and security, there will be increased mandatory sentences for violent offenders, stiffer penalties for drunk drivers, as Senator Bosa has stated, an improvement of law enforcement against the trafficking in and importation of illegal drugs and the strengthening of volunteer crime prevention programs such as Neighbourhood Watch. Those programs engage the citizens of Canada in the improvement of the quality of life and are a weapon against crime. We are just on the threshold of utilizing those weapons.

Amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada will be introduced concerning hard-core pornography, and further legislation will be considered after the presentation of reports of committees on pornography, prostitution and sex offences against children. Legislation will be introduced to establish the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. A special Senate committee was established to consider that matter during the last session and its report will have a deep influence on the new legislation.

There will be changes to the R.C.M.P. Act to provide better attention to the grievances of individuals. There will be increased attention to emergency planning.

With respect to securing individual rights, a bill will be introduced to revise all federal laws so that they conform to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. A new divorce act will be introduced to make the process more equitable and less complex. Work will be undertaken with the provincial governments to strengthen procedures for enforcement of maintenance and custody orders.

With respect to women, there will be more funding for women's voluntary organizations and organizations doing research on women's issues. Housing units will be allocated to victims of family violence pursuant to the recommendations of the Federal-Provincial Task Force on Family Violence. Day-care is on the agenda of the federal-provincial ministers responsible for the status of women and a progress report will be prepared on the decade since International Women's Year.

With respect to the disabled, a pilot project will be established to improve access to public transportation for the disabled. A national plan of action will be introduced to remove obstacles for the disabled.

Regarding native peoples, action will be taken to respond to the Report of the Committee on Indian Self-Government. Legislation will be introduced to remove discrimination against women under the Indian Act. Funding is to be continued for job creation programs on reserves, and a second constitutional Conference on Aboriginal Rights will be held during the month of March 1984. That conference will address aboriginal title, equality rights, aboriginal and treaty rights, land and resources and aboriginal self-government.

[Senator Frith.]

The fifth and last major theme is the pursuing of our Canadian identity. The details are set out, and they consist of a national broadcasting policy relating to greater Canadian content, the extension of French language services, the improvement of international marketing of Canadian cultural projects, the enhancing of regional and native access to broadcasting services, and the providing of incentives for private production of programs.

There will be a new policy on film and proposals to change copyright laws. That is long overdue. The problem of defining "registered charity" will be referred to a joint parliamentary task force.

Multiculturalism was covered very eloquently and thoroughly by Senator Bosa. I do not remember whether he mentioned the Parliamentary Task Force on Visible Minorities, but that will be considered.

With respect to the North, action will be taken to promote balanced development of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Action will also be taken to settle aboriginal land claims and to foster evolution of responsible government in the North, and funds will be provided to strengthen the Northern Oil and Gas Action Plan. There will also be an early announcement concerning the taxation of northern benefits to sustain more permanent communities in the North.

With respect to parliament, immediate action will be taken on parliamentary reforms, and an active interest will be taken in the work of the joint committee on Senate reform.

That is all contained in the Speech from the Throne. It is clear and available to anyone wishing to make critical observations with respect to what is contained in the Speech from the Throne. There is nothing secret about what is contained in the Speech from the Throne. The speech was thorough and covered all of the fields of concern that are and must be before any government in the year or the years ahead.

This is a program of which the Canadian government is proud; it means to put it into effect; it has already been assured publicly of the co-operation of the opposition with respect to the programs it considers to be positive. After listening to Senator Roblin, I can see that there are many that fall into that category.

Therefore, honourable senators, I predict that this session of Parliament, launched with this kind of clear-cut, wide-ranging, thorough Speech from the Throne as a program—and that is all it is and all it can be—will, if we receive the kind of co-operation we have been promised for putting it into effect, be one of which all parliamentarians and Canadians will be proud.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

APPRECIATION OF STAFF

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government):
Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I should like to place on record, on behalf of all honourable senators, our appreciation of how smoothly and professionally the proceedings for the Speech from the Throne were conducted by our Senate staff with the co-operation of the whips and the other place. Usually, the preparation for the Speech from the Throne involves three weeks, but our staff were given very short notice, approximately a week, and it was right on the heels of the prorogation proceedings for which they also had been given very short notice. I know I speak for all honourable senators when I express our sincere appreciation of the really outstanding effort of our staff. They went well beyond the call of duty, in that they worked overtime and all weekend in order to make us feel proud as senators of the proceedings that took place here.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, we, on this side, agree whole-heartedly with the sentiments expressed by Senator Frith. The proceedings were handled perfectly and our staff deserve a great deal of credit.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 19, 1983, at 8 p.m.

THE HONOURABLE JEAN MARCHAND P.C.

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity this evening to pay tribute to the Honourable Jean Marchand, our former colleague, who resigned last week, on December 15, as Speaker and member of the Senate.

Jean Marchand was appointed to the Senate on December 9, 1976. I remember that when he was appointed, the new senator said that instead of ending his career, he was starting a new, longer and satisfying one. He settled down to work right away, thus letting his actions demonstrate the truth of what he said. Mr. Marchand became Speaker of the Senate in March 1980, and since that time has used all the resources of his position to defend the rights, integrity and independence of the Senate against any encroachment by the House of Commons, with its far greater number of Members.

To help him carry out this task, he created a public information and education branch responsible for informing the public about the importance of the role of the Senate.

Senator Marchand also took on very substantial diplomatic duties. As you know, honourable colleagues, the duties of the Speaker of the Senate rank fourth in order of precedence in Canada, and the services of the Speaker of our institution are ever more in demand. Since he was appointed Speaker, he has travelled over 250,000 kilometres on official missions in more than twelve countries. In addition to the role of co-chairman which he assumed in a number of joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons, and in addition to the administrative responsibilities involved in the Speaker's function, Senator Marchand has made a contribution to a host of charitable, scientific and parliamentary organizations. Honorary degrees in law, industry relations and social sciences were conferred on Senator Marchand by various universities.

Before he was appointed to the Senate, Jean Marchand played a major role for more than three decades, during which a number of important events brought about profound changes in Canada and Quebec, his province of birth. The former union leader, federal Minister and social worker never stopped working, always with his customary energy, in his various functions.

After finishing a course in social and political sciences at Laval University, in 1942 he became an organizer for the Canadian Confederation of Catholic Workers. Five years later, he had risen to the senior ranks of the same organization, which later became the powerful Confederation of National Trade Unions. Here, he spent twenty-three years, acting first as Secretary General and later as President. He played a prominent role in a number of social and labour disputes which pitted him against Maurice Duplessis, Premier of Quebec at the time. We remember the asbestos strike and the struggle for education reform for workers in the pulp and paper industry which led to the first Quebec statute on labour relations. With his friends he helped pave the way for the Quiet Revolution, a major development in the social history of Quebec.

In the fifties and sixties, he was a member of a host of national commissions and international organizations operating in the social, economic and labour sphere.

I was privileged to be a member of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission with Senator Marchand.

From 1963 to 1976, Mr. Marchand held various portfolios, including Transport and Environment. He also created two new Departments, Manpower and Immigration and Regional Economic Expansion. In concluding, I offer him, on behalf of the Government our best wishes in his new position as President of the Canadian Transport Commission.

[English]

Honourable senators, in the name of the government and on behalf of all those on this side, I should like to congratulate our new Speaker on his appointment. We are all confident that the Senate is, indeed, in good hands, and will be ably administered by our new Speaker.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may reverse the order of speaking used by the house leader this evening, I will address my first words to our new Speaker.

I have known of Maurice Riel favourably, indeed, because of his association in the legal world with the firm of Stikeman, Elliott, Tamaki, Mercier & Robb. I have heard many fine things of him from his partners in that organization. However, when I heard him read the prayers in such mellifluous and pleasing French, and saw him garbed as the Speaker with his robe, gloves, cravat and hat, it occurred to me that he was to the manner born and that he had been just waiting for the time when he would assume the function he is occupying tonight.

I am sure his appointment as Speaker of this house will further adorn his celebrated career as a Canadian citizen and public servant. I feel the Senate can rest easy that, under his presidency, its work will continue to be useful.

On behalf of the members on this side, and I am sure on behalf of everyone in the chamber, I add our congratulations to our new Speaker and offer our best wishes for his enjoyment of the office.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Now, I should like to say something about the man he has succeeded, because one can fairly say that the Honourable Jean Lesage is a man whose career has taken surprising turns.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

An Hon. Senator: Jean Lesage? Jean Marchand.

Senator Roblin: Wait until he hears what I have said! However, he may not be entirely displeased to be associated with a man of Jean Lesage's reputation and character. Probably my slip of the tongue arises from the fact that Jean Marchand began his political activities, as far as I recall, at the time when Jean Lesage was active in politics in this country. Jean Marchand has been a leader in the social development and the advance of his own Province of Quebec; he has developed the reputation of being faithful to his province, but, at the same time, being a strong believer in our Confederation.

When he entered the House of Commons in 1965, he was described as one of the "three wise men" coming to Parliament at that time. There are some who think he may be the wisest of the three. I offer no opinion on that score; I simply say that he qualified for the general description. While he was in the House of Commons, as Senator Guay knows very well, he occupied a number of portfolios with great distinction, and during his career there proved himself to be resourceful, candid and frank. In fact, at one time, in his assessment of the Department of Transport, he was so frank that it became a parliamentary sensation; but that, in my opinion, reflects greatly to his credit.

Honourable senators, when I entered the Senate a little while ago, Jean Marchand was a front bencher, first in the government and then, for a short period of time, in the opposition. He established his credentials, to my mind, as being a colourful, eloquent and vigorous proponent of the views for which he stood. When he became the Speaker of the Senate in 1980, he conducted himself in that post with grace and impartiality. But I am sure that some of us must be aware of the fact that he really did not find that role sufficiently active, in the political sense, for a man of his previous record and accomplishments. Therefore, although, as I started out by saying, he is a man whose life has taken a surprising turn, perhaps we need not be too surprised to find that he has now decided to take on new responsibilities.

There is one thing about his change of venue, honourable senators, that pleases me; that is that it is perfectly clear that his age—and mine is not too far away from his—is certainly no indication that there isn't plenty of life in that old dog, if I may use that affectionate expression, for the years to come. He has now become the administrator of one of the powerful instruments of our national policy. I am sure that he will leave his mark on the office of Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission. We are going to miss him in the Senate. We are particularly going to miss his luncheons and his little celebrations after Royal Assent, but I am sure that we all wish him well in his new activity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I think that the honourable Jean Marchand's decision to accept major responsibilities in the Canadian public service has taken some of us by surprise.

One would have thought that at his age—although he is still relatively young—he would not have assumed such heavy responsibilities. I have known the Honourable Jean Marchand for quite some time and this is the kind of challenge he likes. His whole life has been a series of challenges which he has never failed to take up successfully.

I first met him when he was fighting for organized labour. Our paths crossed again later in politics. He has always been a man of principle and never did he compromise about a principle in which he firmly believed.

All honourable senators will recall the major decision he took when he left the Cabinet on a basic question, namely the use of French in air services. In his eyes, that was a question about which his basic principles did not leave room for argument.

Jean Marchand has always fought for the cause of French-speaking Canadians. In my opinion, Quebecers are lucky to have had such an uncompromising and valiant champion sitting in the other place as minister of various departments.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Not only Quebecers!

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, he was a rough player, as has been said, a good debater. If ever you had an opportunity to hear him during electoral campaigns in Quebec, you know he could stir the crowds at will.

Others have known other aspects of his personality, but I have known him when I was fighting against him. Being of different political persuasions, we had to meet now and then, and sometimes we landed heavy blows. He has always shown respect for his opponent, and he was a courageous and conscientious man.

I will remember all my life the time when I had to suffer great family hardships. In any difficult situation, Jean Marchand was among the first to help me; he was there with a parliamentary delegation to lift my spirits and encourage me to face up to the difficult hours ahead of me. To me Jean Marchand is a prominent French Canadian—he will always remain a great friend of Quebec. I feel the Senate will miss his sense of humour, because he did have humour to spare.

I know that we will miss Jean Marchand, and I wish him the best of luck in the new responsibilities he has decided to assume.

Jean Marchand is being succeeded by a good friend of mine, Senator Maurice Riel. We have known each other for a long time, Senator Riel. The moment one becomes a friend of Senator Riel, there is no way one can cease to be, so great is his kindness, openness and sincerity.

I met him in interesting circumstances. We were sitting on the same Boards of Directors of Canadian corporations. His good judgement was always to be relied upon in discussions and, of course, his sound advice was always sought.

Senator Riel has the reputation of the good lawyer he has been and still is. The Quebec Bar Association has always been privileged in having Maurice Riel as a very brilliant member.

We can be assured that he will perform his new functions with great tact, because he has excellent judgment. As far as we in the Opposition are concerned, we promise him all possible co-operation.

We look forward to reading his rulings, which certainly will add to our jurisprudence in this House.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Yvette Rousseau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with the other honourable senators in offering you my warmest congratulations and wishing you every possible success on your appointment as Speaker of the Senate.

We know in advance that we shall benefit from your experience and great generosity.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to pay tribute to the Honourable Jean Marchand.

How can we honour the Honourable Jean Marchand with mere words? How can we express the deep affection we have for him? How can we show him our respect and gratitude?

If it were necessary to do so, I believe that we would have to pay homage to him not only as former Speaker of this House, but also as Jean Marchand himself. Indeed, for him, the man came before the politician, the leader before the administrator and the militant before the supporter.

I have a lot of personal memories of the Honourable Jean Marchand; I remember his qualities as a man of action and of duty and as a democrat. It would take quite sometime to give all the details of his career to this august assembly. On the other hand, I can talk about his accomplishments as they relate to my own experience.

To pay homage to the Honourable Jean Marchand, it is necessary to establish a parallel with the very history of Quebec, its political and ideological trends, its labour struggles, its collective frictions and its aspirations for the future.

To pay homage to the Honourable Jean Marchand, it is necessary to establish a parallel with the history of modern Canada, with a vision of a country which he served with ability and generosity.

To pay homage to Senator Marchand, it is necessary finally to recognize his influence within the international community, his everlasting desire to see in men what brings them closer together rather than what separates them.

The appointment which the Honourable Jean Marchand has just accepted honours him. He is leaving the political arena, the speakership of the Senate, for a position which is well suited to his personality.

Like Cincinnatus, the legendary Roman hero, who was successively peasant, soldier and statesman, he is going back to the plough and refusing honours the better to serve the Canadian community.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to wish every possible success to the Honourable Jean Marchand. Just before we celebrate the Nativity I can only ask The Lord to grant Senator Marchand and his family long life, happiness and contentment. This is the message that I wanted to give to the Honourable Jean Marchand.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I shall, if I may, add my congratulations to the new Speaker. Unlike most of you, I have hardly had time to observe the measure of experience he brings to his new duties. During the short time I have been a member of this Chamber, I have seen how Senator Riel approached problems and the spirit of moderation with which he faced all contentious issues. I would like to take as an example the debate on the Constitution. This carefully considered way of approaching problems is our assurance that he will bring the same approach to conducting the proceedings of this Chamber. I therefore wish to congratulate him and at the same time give him the assurance of my complete co-operation. I am sure he will preside over the Senate with wisdom and prudence, since those are supposed to be the qualities of the Senate which set it apart from the House of Commons.

That being said, I would now, in a very personal and informal way, like to talk about Jean Marchand's leaving the Senate. We were classmates in the Department of Social Science, then directed by Father Lévesque. As a result, and due to other circumstances as well, I was able to follow him more or less throughout his career. Mr. Marchand and a number of other personalities became part of Quebec's evolution, in a way that is somewhat mysterious to outside observers. I think that it is the mysterious reality that Quebec represents for other Canadians which explains Senator Roblin's slip when he confused Mr. Lesage and Mr. Marchand.

This points to a general reality, which is that Quebec is a mystery to many Canadians. It is easy to involuntarily slip up and confuse the facts.

Having followed Jean Marchand's career since we are classmates at the courses given by Father Levesque, it is perhaps appropriate in the circumstances—if Senator Guay would allow me to address him directly—to recall as Senator Rousseau did a while ago, that Jean Marchand was at the very heart of things. He was even involved in the heart of what I would call the reality that may have created a number of problems in the rest of the country, and I am referring to the building of what has been referred to as “French power” in Ottawa. He was even at the heart of the making of a Prime Minister. Not many people will come out and say this, but in fact, when the three “doves” arrived on the federal scene, he played a part in the coming to power of individuals who otherwise would not have done so. Within this process, Jean Marchand was a strong personality, with solid roots in union activity. In 1965, he had a significance that went well beyond that of others in the Quebec milieu. He had a very special significance in the eyes of the then Prime Minister, Lester Pearson. I will not elaborate, except to say that Jean Marchand was at the heart of many events in the evolution of Quebec and Canada.

He will now continue to be active in an institution that has become a very significant part of Canada's development. As far as his leaving the Senate is concerned, knowing Jean Marchand as I do, I cannot say his decision came as a complete surprise. I have always had the impression that his attitude as Speaker of the Senate always betrayed some impatience with the passive role of the Speaker, which is understandable considering his temperament, which is that of an active man. It was therefore not surprising that he should find another outlet for his energies. The Transport Commission is offering him that opportunity. I am glad that he will be able to make as effective a contribution as the one he made in helping to build Canada and Quebec. I wish him the best of luck.

[English]

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, first of all I would like to express my congratulations to our new Speaker. I wish him well in his new job. Regrettably, I do not know him as well as I know his predecessor, but we in the Senate are proud and honoured that he has reached this high position in which we wish him every success.

I now wish to say something regarding the Honourable Jean Marchand. I entered the other place in 1957; he came some years later, and we then had the pleasure of working together—and, many times, of working against each other.

As has been said by many senators on both sides of the house, the Honourable Jean Marchand spent decades working in his native province as a social worker, and as a union worker and organizer of unions, and he reached the pinnacle of his union, as was mentioned by Senator Frith. During those days in Quebec a man like the Honourable Jean Marchand was certainly needed. Frankly, had I lived in Quebec then I would have been by his side, regardless of our political differences.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Hear, hear.

Senator Muir: Although I never reached the top, as did the Honourable Jean Marchand, I was involved in organizing unions and was, of course, a member of a union. I was also on strike, as was the Honourable Jean Marchand. During those days of strikes and picket duty, the Honourable Jean Marchand and I had to resort to measures that we do not like to talk about today, but that was part of our job. We had to do certain things in order to reach our goals.

I was a member of the other place when the Honourable Jean Marchand was the Minister of Transport. He also held other portfolios, including that of Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, under which the Cape Breton Development Corporation came. Often we would have fierce and violent debates, but he was the first to come along afterwards, slap you on the back and say, “Bob, you were in great shape today.” That is the way a democracy works, and I certainly believe in that. Both of us had strong opinions and we argued violently, but nothing was ever taken personally by the Honourable Jean Marchand. He is that kind of man.

It is easy for pseudo-journalists and pseudo-intellectuals immediately to take quill in hand and write in an uncompromising fashion, but some of them are not old enough to remember people such as Duplessis, or to remember what was done by men such as the Honourable Jean Marchand. They do not even take the time to refer to the history books to learn what took place in those days. So quickly these things are forgotten.

The Honourable Senator Roblin mentioned the age of 65, but some of the greatest wisdom has come from people slightly older than 65, and there are a number of us in the Senate who have reached that age. I have not yet reached it, but it won't be long.

What has been done by former and present members of this chamber is quickly forgotten by the scribes, if one can call them that. How quickly they castigate individuals, regardless of their political leanings. This chamber has had, and still has, as members former provincial premiers and many others who have done a great deal for this country and continue to serve it well.

Honourable senators, just as there are bonds between those in the legal fraternity, there are bonds between those who are, or have been, involved in the union movement, but they are unwritten bonds. I recall that on many occasions I went to see the Honourable Jean Marchand with what I thought were serious problems and he was always willing to listen to my arguments. He would try to get his point across, and I would try to get mine across, but I found him to be a fair person at all times. I have no doubt that he will do a very good job in his new position.

I wish him good health, every success and, as I believe tomorrow is his birthday, a happy birthday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I want to join all the members of the Senate who have already spoken in tribute to the devotion, sincerity and fine work performed by Senator Marchand. I agree with all the comments made this evening and I wish to thank the Honourable Jean Marchand not only for what he has accomplished in the Senate, because he has already made his mark in the House, but also for what he has done for the entire country.

I had the privilege of serving as his parliamentary secretary over twelve years ago. That is when I realized that Jean Marchand was a doer. He has proved it and those who rose this evening, even the members opposite acknowledged his achievements. It was an honour for me to work with Jean Marchand, and along with the previous speakers I would like to say: Now Jean Marchand is assuming other duties because he wants to do something useful for all Canadians at the national level.

I wish him good health so that he can perform the task he has set for himself because we had the opportunity to appreciate his extraordinary career.

I would have liked to elaborate further, honourable senators, but my final word will be to wish him good health and every success.

As for the new Speaker of this House, I have come to know him quite well, especially since we have been neighbours in the East Block. Senator Riel always reminds me of our past in Manitoba, more especially of Louis Riel. Even if Senator Riel and his forefathers were from Quebec, I think that he is somewhat related to Louis Riel; anyway this is how I consider him. It is an honour for the French-speaking citizens of western Canada to see you Mr. Speaker fill this very important position in the Senate. I would like to point out that we in western Canada greatly appreciate the fact that a man with the name of Riel has been appointed to that position and that he will do us proud. I wish you every success and good health.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, I fully endorse the eloquent tribute which my colleagues, and especially Senator Rousseau and Senator Asselin, have rendered to our former president.

Jean Marchand is a very dear friend of mine; I wish him a tremendous success in his new endeavour.

To our new Speaker I offer my best wishes. I have always appreciated his culture and great sociability, and I am sure that he will fulfill his duties with great dignity and competence.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

EXPLOSION AT PLANT—EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, before we proceed to Question Period, I should like to make a brief statement with respect to the sad events which took place at the Sydney Steel Corporation plant last week.

As many of you know, yet another tragedy hit the industrial area of Cape Breton when, last Thursday at approximately 9.30 p.m., an explosion at No. 1 blast furnace, operated by the Sydney Steel Corporation, resulted in the untimely death of three outstanding employees of the company and outstanding citizens of the Cape Breton community. It also resulted in injuries to two other men. One of those injured has since been discharged from hospital, and the second is reported to be in stable condition. It is, indeed, a blessing and of some comfort that the number of victims was not greater.

This tragedy has struck at a time of the year when happiness should be the order of the day. In recent months there were many good reasons for happiness at Sydney Steel. The rehabilitation program was on schedule and within budget. The plant was turning out what many regard to be the best steel rails ever produced at Sydney Steel and, for that matter, in all of Canada.

I was at my home in Sydney, about one mile from the plant, when the furnace erupted. The shock waves were felt and heard for many miles around. Like many others, I went immediately to the plant. I had an opportunity to meet there with management and union officials who, with their coal-mining brothers in the area, long ago learned to cope with adversity and uncertainty.

Amidst the sadness and the sorrow there is a degree of optimism. The officials are confident that within two or three weeks they will be restored to the situation which prevailed prior to the accident. In the meantime, I understand that between 70 to 80 employees have been laid off while repairs are being implemented.

I am sure that all honourable senators, and particularly my esteemed colleagues from Cape Breton, Senators Macdonald, Muir and Murray, would want to join with me in an expression of deepest sympathy to those families who have suffered bereavement and injury, as well as to all their brother steelworkers in the area.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Will you allow me to rise on a point of order, before you ask your question?

Senator Tremblay: Very well.

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I would appreciate clearing up a matter which is somewhat embarrassing to us. That point of order of course concerns the Acting Government Leader in the Senate.

We have a Question Period. And usually our questions are put to Ministers of the Crown according to our Standing Orders. Ministers of the Crown alone share Cabinet solidarity, and they alone can take the responsibility of answering for and on behalf of the Cabinet.

But we are now faced with a situation where oftentimes Ministers of the Crown in the Senate are not in attendance. I am not blaming them. We know they have Cabinet responsibilities, and from time to time they have to discharge those responsibilities outside this House.

But this deprives the Opposition of a right under our rules. I mean the right to address questions to Ministers of the Crown on all Government actions, the right to ask questions and supplementaries. Admittedly, the position of the Deputy Leader of the Government is a difficult one. He cannot himself take the responsibility of answering on behalf of the Cabinet, because he is not a Cabinet member. He must then take our questions under advisement, discuss them with the Minister who is responsible and come back to the Senate with an answer from the Minister.

This is preventing senators in this House from discharging their responsibility to seek information.

My point of order is not aimed at embarrassing the Acting Leader in the Senate. Surely he will understand as well as I do that as a senator who is not a Cabinet member and has no ministerial responsibilities, he must be careful. As much as I know him, he will not take it upon himself to make decisions involving the Cabinet, because he is not a member of the Cabinet and does not have access to the kind of information which is available to Senator Austin, who sits across the aisle from me.

If the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate tells us: Well I will take your questions as notice, I will get the information and will answer according to the information I get, so be it. But this will prevent us from asking supplementaries, getting additional information. Therefore, in each instance, the Deputy Leader will have to go back to the Minister and get answers to our supplementaries, that is the additional information we are requesting.

We are in a difficult position, and so is the Deputy Leader. Unfortunately, because of the possibly protected absence of the Government Leader in the Senate, Senator Olson, we would like to know how we are going to ask our questions?

Will the Deputy Leader take responsibility for answering questions when there are no Ministers present in the Senate? Will he accept our questions as notices, seek the required information from the Minister and advise the senator who asked the questions?

We should like to be better informed as to the extent the opposition may obtain satisfaction concerning its requests for information.

I should like to obtain the opinion of the Acting Leader as to the extent the government might commit itself to reply to the questions.

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest that we look closely at the way an ordinary senator could reply on behalf of the government to the questions of the opposition.

I am not asking this question maliciously. We just want to clear the situation and know what approach we should take concerning the Question Period.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to emphasize the fact that it is only on a rare occasion that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is absent from his house during the Question Period. I should like to advise the Senate of Senator Olson's health condition. He has gone through the operation which I mentioned last week. I am very happy to report that on the day following the operation, Senator Olson was up and could walk. He has spent fewer than 48 hours in intensive care at the Civic Hospital. He is now under intensive care at the National Defence Hospital. According to his physicians, he is doing fine. He is even ahead of his expected recovery. He will continue his recovery at home.

As to the other points which Senator Asselin has raised, I think it is quite normal that Senator Olson take certain questions as notices. This occurs generally when the question implies some information which is required from a department for which another member of the Cabinet is responsible and results from the fact that the question period is meant essentially as a mechanism to obtain information.

I promise to spend as much energy as Senator Olson did to seek information from his colleagues in special cases. As I have already stated, it is quite normal for Senator Olson to contact his colleagues of the Cabinet when the question deals essentially with the administration of another department.

As to the general aspect of the question, I will try to fulfill to the best of my ability the duties of the Leader of the

[Senator Asselin.]

Government in the Senate. As to the departments which are the responsibilities of Senators Argue and Austin—

Senator Asselin: You have no departmental responsibility.

Senator Frith: Yes, I agree.

Senator Asselin: You have no ministerial responsibility.

Senator Frith: I cannot answer right away on behalf of the government. Still, I point out that Senator Olson, who can answer right away as member of the Cabinet, does take a question as notice now and then because he cannot speak for another minister. I have to consult other ministers before answering many of the questions put to me here. I cannot say what is Cabinet policy because I am not a member of the Cabinet. That is my answer in the absence of Senator Olson.

I am committing myself right now to try to get the information as soon as possible, including answers to supplementary questions. With respect to certain aspects of government policy which normally are the responsibility of Senator Olson, Senator Austin or Senator Argue will try to answer along the lines of general principles. That is how we will have to behave while waiting for the return of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Asselin: The most logical way to solve this problem would be to recommend to the Prime Minister that our colleague be temporarily appointed Minister of State until Senator Olson gets back. That might clear up the situation and ease his conscience and his professional ethics with respect to ministerial responsibility. Senator Frith is taking chances when he claims to answer questions dealing with government policy. It is decided by the Cabinet. You might find yourself in a difficult position.

Senator Frith: I take this opportunity to set the record straight. I cannot answer questions on policies decided in Cabinet meetings. If it is a general statement on government policy, Senator Argue or Senator Austin can try to answer. Otherwise, the only possibility, as Senator Olson does from time to time, is to consult ministers or try to obtain information through my colleagues.

Senator Asselin: Good luck!

EDUCATION

POST-SECONDARY—STATUS OF FUNDING

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, fortunately, my question has nothing to do with the exchange we have just heard. It aims at obtaining information about a question asked during the previous session and addressed to the Leader of the Government, Senator Olson.

In passing, I should like to take this opportunity to inquire about his health. Senator Frith has just given us very good news and I am happy to hear it. I would ask him to tell Senator Olson that I wish him a speedy recovery.

My question aims at reviving one I have already asked and which died on the order paper. It concerns the progress accomplished in the negotiations about post-secondary education financing between the Federal Government and the provinces. I was more explicit when I asked Senator Olson for this information. These negotiations have been going on for quite a while between the Secretary of State, the Honourable Mr. Joyal, and the provincial ministers responsible for post-secondary education. I asked the same question a year ago. At the time, I had received a quite satisfactory reply from Senator Olson. I am asking the same question simply to learn what progress has been made in these negotiations.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have certain information dated December 13, 1983 about established program financing. I would like to compare this information to help Senator Tremblay. I shall probably be able to give a more explicit reply within the next couple of days.

Senator Tremblay: I thank you for that information. It is not quite certain that the financing of post-secondary education can really be included in established program financing. I remind the Acting Leader of the Government that my question concerns the financing of post-secondary education, while established program financing has a wider scope, if my information is correct. I make the point simply to avoid any uncertainty about my question when a reply is prepared.

Senator Frith: I would like to examine more fully the information available to me to give a more accurate answer.

Senator Tremblay: The answer is not immediately available.

JUSTICE

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—STATUS OF PROSECUTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Honourable Senator Austin in his capacity as the minister who answers for Eldorado Nuclear Corporation. In 1981 charges were laid by the Crown against six companies engaged in the production of uranium. It was alleged that they had broken the law by forming a cartel in 1972 in respect of the world market for uranium. My question has to do with the decision that has been rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada to the effect that the two crown corporations, Eldorado Nuclear Corporation and Uranium Canada, owing to crown privilege, are exempt from prosecution under this charge.

My question to the minister is: In view of the fact that six companies were charged and that two are now said to be immune from prosecution, does the government intend to proceed with the case against the other four companies involved in this matter?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I shall consult with the Minister of Justice and endeavour to obtain a reply for Senator Roblin. I know the Minister of Justice answered questions on this matter in the other place at the end of last week, and he said then that he had the matter under consideration.

Senator Roblin: I thank the minister for his reply. I am sure he knows as well as I that he is in a good position to know the facts on this matter, because in 1972 he was deputy minister, and, according to some information I have seen, he was reported to have been perhaps the guiding spirit when this club of six was formed to increase the price of uranium in the world market. I presume the minister's stance, both in this house and probably before the courts, would be that nothing he or, similarly, the government did was illegal. If that is the case, why does the government not waive crown immunity and allow the charges against the two crown corporations to proceed? It seems to me that, if it did that, nothing would be lost in this matter, and perhaps a good deal would be gained, because, as one of the justices of the Supreme Court remarked, the present situation is tantamount to having a carte blanche to engage in illegal activities on behalf of the Crown and to encourage other corporate citizens to do likewise. It would be in the public interest to have this matter ventilated.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, let me be emphatically clear at the beginning that nothing I did in my capacity as Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was illegal, whether it related to uranium or any other subject. Nor have I ever heard any competent authority make such a suggestion. The Honourable Senator Roblin recognizes that the matters on which he is touching remain sub judice in terms of the substantive nature of the charges brought against certain privately-owned uranium companies in Canada. I find it difficult to comment on the proceedings inasmuch as my responsibility is limited to that of Eldorado Nuclear. However, I shall consult with the Minister of Justice and endeavour to bring an answer on the subject of waiving immunity to this house at an early time.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate my honourable friend's answer and I want him to be quite clear that I am not making an allegation that he did something he should not have done. I would not wish that to stand on the record, even by implication. But I would say to my honourable friend that it seems to me invidious that the government is contemplating proceedings against four companies but is excluding two companies simply because they are crown corporations. In some jurisdictions of this country, such as Manitoba, the privilege of the Crown has been discarded as being an outdated prerogative not in the public interest. As a result, people in Manitoba are able to sue the Crown just as they might sue any other person in the courts. So I ask my honourable friend whether he will undertake to suggest to his colleague, the Minister of Justice, that the government waive crown immunity in respect of these two companies, thereby allowing the matter to be dealt with without discrimination between private companies and public companies.

It seems to me questionable to say that we will not prosecute the private companies because we would be discriminating against them, seeing that the public ones enjoy crown immunity. The way out of the dilemma is quite easy—simply waive the crown immunity of the two corporations. Will my honourable friend undertake to propose to his colleague that he undertake that course?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the Crown has divisible functions, as Senator Roblin well knows, having led a government in the province of Manitoba. In the case of one of these divisions the prosecutions against certain public and private uranium companies were launched as a result of a report of counsel in private practice in Ontario, Mr. Brown, who was asked by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs of the day to undertake investigations. He participated in an investigation conducted by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. As the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, said, the government added nothing to and took nothing from the recommendation of Mr. Brown that certain prosecutions should be launched. Therefore, those proceedings were launched in the form and in the nature recommended by Mr. Brown; that is, without any interpretation or amendment of any kind by the Minister of Justice or the law officers of the Crown. Those proceedings are under way at this time. As Senator Roblin well knows the Crown felt obliged on the advice of its law officers to plead the government's ancient entitlement to crown immunity.

The Supreme Court of Canada has found that the Crown has crown immunity with respect to two crown corporations, those being Eldorado and Uranium Canada. I have not read the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in this regard but I have heard reports.

I have heard Senator Roblin's representations. I am not certain what the rights of the Minister of Justice are with respect to the proceedings as they now stand, or what position he is prepared to take. However, in my capacity as a minister of the Crown I will make inquiries and, if it is appropriate for me to respond in this chamber on behalf of the Minister of Justice, then I will be pleased to do so.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think my honourable friend's sketch of the history is correct. It is commendable that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the crown officials took the course they followed. However, the point I wish to make with the minister is that he is the minister responsible for Eldorado; if any consents are required to waive the crown immunity, then his is probably one of those which will be sought. In his capacity as minister responsible for Eldorado will he tell this chamber that he is willing to agree to a waiver of immunity in the way in which I have suggested?

Senator Austin: As the minister responsible for Eldorado I cannot reply to that without first receiving the advice of the Minister of Justice, who I am sure will solicit the advice of the law officers of the Crown. Thus, at this moment I am not in a position to give any response, except to say that I will make inquiries of the Minister of Justice in an expeditious way and will, where he so advises, pass the results of those inquiries on to this chamber.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I appreciate what the minister has said. With respect to the same subject there are two other points which I ask my honourable friend to advise me on. How many other crown corporations are there which enjoy the position of crown immunity?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I can only take notice of that question for the Minister of Justice. I think it would be helpful if Senator Roblin were able to describe an actual circumstance, since crown immunity only arises under certain given circumstances. If he has something specific in mind, I would be pleased to hear it and pass it on to the Minister of Justice; if he is asking a hypothetical question, I will, of course, pass that on to the Minister of Justice as well, but I think it would probably be less likely to elicit a helpful response.

Senator Roblin: I am afraid I cannot give my honourable friend the information he seeks; I do not think it is necessary. There are a great variety of crown corporations directly or remotely connected with the Crown. If the minister asks the Department of Justice to which of those corporations the principle of crown immunity applies, I am sure he will be able to find the answer. It is important that we know how extensive this privilege is.

After my honourable friend has provided that information I would then ask him to inform us whether or not the government has any intention to reconsider the issue of crown immunity in respect of the circumstances we find ourselves in today. This may be somewhat an exaggeration, but as time passes more and more crown corporations are created and more and more crown activities are approved in normal commercial fields. If the principle of crown immunity applies to those corporations in the way it applies to these uranium miners, we will find the rights and privileges of Canadian citizens being seriously circumscribed.

A very important question of policy has been raised in this issue and I ask my honourable friend to inquire of the Minister of Justice whether or not he can provide a statement to us regarding what types of crown corporations are eligible for crown immunity. I would then ask my honourable friend to give a statement of government policy with respect to whether the government intends to allow this situation to continue or whether it intends to do something about it.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I will certainly make the inquiries of the Minister of Justice which I have indicated previously and which Senator Roblin has repeated in his last question. I will endeavour to be as helpful as I can with respect to the advice of the Minister of Justice.

With respect to the general subject I would like to say in passing that, although I have not seen the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to Eldorado and Uranium Canada, I believe it does not affect either positively or negatively the legal position of the remaining companies which have been charged with respect to export sales of uranium. I certainly do not want to leave any implication that those privately owned are in any way guilty of illegal activity. I am sure Senator Roblin does not want to leave that implication. This is a matter which remains before the courts and which is not judged or affected by the current ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I agree entirely with my honourable friend's view in this respect; however, it begs the question. That is not the point at all. The point was raised very eloquently by Mr. Justice Dickson, who said that there seems to be a conflict with the basic notions of equality before the law. That is the real point here. Mr. Justice Dickson went on to say that that is the current state of affairs and that the court is not entitled to question the basic concept of crown immunity. In reading the dissenting judgment of Madam Justice Wilson, honourable senators will see that she pinpoints the issue more directly and expresses the very firm opinion that to rule as the court has done gives carte blanche to crown corporations to do what they like. Of course, they are not likely to do what they like in any broad or significant sense; the fact is that these two corporations have done something which is certainly questionable. The fact that they can avoid judicial examination seems to Mr. Justice Dickson to run against the principle of equality before the law. I think he is right.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I hope this will be my last word on this subject. I agree with Senator Roblin that it is appropriate to ask the question with respect to the policy of the application of crown immunity in regard to activities of a commercial nature. It is not a question of law which I understand the honourable senator to be putting to this chamber. I understand his question to be with respect to policy. It is not my purpose at this moment to deal with either the question of law or the question of policy. However, on those questions I will pursue the information which Senator Roblin seeks.

Senator Roblin: Thank you. I wish to make it clear that I am not interested in the minister's opinion with respect to questions of law. No doubt his opinion is valuable. That is not my point; I am interested in the government's policy.

WRONGFUL IMPRISONMENT—CIVIL LIABILITY

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. He will recall that I previously raised in this chamber a question regarding Donald Marshall, a young Micmac Indian from Nova Scotia who spent 11 years of his life incarcerated in Dorchester Penitentiary for a crime which the courts now say he did not commit.

I was pleased to hear that some progress had been made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate as a result of his surgery. However, it was to him that I posed the original question regarding this matter and I have been awaiting a response.

The federal Minister of Justice has made a statement regarding this case, as has the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am aware that, even if the Deputy Leader of the Government were a member of the cabinet, he could not divulge what is discussed there; but perhaps he could find out, through discussion with these two departments, whether any consideration is being given to compensating Mr. Marshall for the years he spent in jail for a crime he did not commit. Could he also find out whether consideration is being given to looking after this man's legal fees and whether there are any discussions going on between the federal Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of the Province of Nova Scotia regarding the whole subject?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is quite proper for Senator Muir to ask me to find out if the subject is under consideration. It is also reasonable for him to ask whether any discussions are taking place between the federal Minister of Justice and his provincial counterpart, and I shall try to obtain that information.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Committee of Selection, which was presented earlier today.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, that the report be now adopted.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe this is the motion on the Speaker pro tem. One of the senators asked for an explanation on this matter and my honourable friend, Senator Petten, promised to favour us with one.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, representatives of the leadership of both sides of the chamber met, and decided that the appointment of Speaker pro tem would be in order. Senator Molgat was approached; he agreed to serve, and it is my understanding that this is what we are now voting on.

However, the acting leader, Senator Frith, attended those meetings and I did not, and perhaps he would like to add something to what I have already said.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I would like to remind honourable senators that some time ago our previous Speaker, Senator Marchand, asked that we consider the appointment of a Speaker pro tem. The idea was discussed by Senator Flynn, Senator Olson and me and the matter was then referred to the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders and was the subject of considerable discussion and debate in that committee.

The committee decided to recommend that the rules be changed to provide for a Speaker pro tem to act in the absence of the Speaker. However, payment for the position would require an amendment to the legislation and the decision of the committee was that, when it made its report, it would not recommend that the legislation be amended at this time but that the position be set up and that the rules be amended accordingly.

That report was adopted by the Senate, and the rules were changed accordingly with the proviso that the provision was not to take effect until the new session.

The Committee of Selection was charged with the responsibility of making a report to the Senate regarding the appointment of a Speaker pro tem. Discussions then took place between the leaders as to who would be an appropriate person. The name of Senator Molgat was suggested. He was asked and agreed to serve. That is the background of this report which deals only with the question of the Speaker pro tem.

Senator Roblin: Senator Molgat has maintained a becoming silence. If he would just nod his head to indicate his interest in accepting this offer, it would reassure me.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Second Report of the Committee of Selection, which was presented earlier today.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, that the report be now adopted.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am opposed to the motion for reasons which I shall state on another appropriate occasion. Moreover, I am opposed to any amendment to the motion at any stage where my name is used without my prior consent having been received.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to make a small observation here in connection with a change to our rules which indicates that the leaders on either side of the house or their deputies may be ex officio members of committees, depending on who happens to be present at a meeting. In other words, if Senator Flynn appears at a committee ex officio, then I as his deputy shall not. However, if he is not there and I do appear, then I am accorded the honour of being an ex officio member.

I suggested that some indication of this change in our rules be offered in the list. Unfortunately, I do not have a copy of the new list that was circulated earlier this evening. However, I would like to be informed whether or not the change in the rules allowing for the possibility of two ex officio members is indicated on our sheet.

Senator Petten: It is on my sheet, Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: Thank you. I just did not have the latest copy.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-2

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motion:

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

[Senator Frith.]

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-2, intitled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

• (2130)

He said: Honourable senators, this motion is intended to provide an opportunity for the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to conduct a pre-study on what has become known as the income tax amendments bill. These amendments flow from the budget and the committee is geared to commence its pre-study tomorrow.

The other place has adopted a house order to accelerate its consideration of this bill. That house order provides that there will be a maximum of 20 minutes' debate given to each party. That debate is to commence at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of Wednesday of this week. That house order also states that the bill will be voted on at third reading, with all necessary questions being put, no later than 4 o'clock. That assumes that each of the three parties uses its full 20 minutes.

There is also an agreement that there will be a 15-minute bell. That means that this bill will be voted on at third reading and probably passed by the other place on Wednesday of this week at approximately 4:30 p.m.

For reasons that I hope will commend themselves to honourable senators, this bill must be passed by the end of this year. There are good reasons for that, and I intend to explain some of them later. If we are to pass this bill by the end of this year, we will have to sit on Thursday and Friday of this week or between Christmas and the New Year. This will have to be discussed by the leadership in the Senate, as well as by the two caucuses.

There are various possibilities. We could sit on Wednesday evening and resume early Thursday morning, at which time we would have the report from the committee on the pre-study and could debate the matter until we felt we had had sufficient debate. On the other hand, we could go into Committee of the Whole and have the minister present to answer questions.

I am ready to attempt to arrange whatever the leadership in the Senate and the two caucuses wish to have happen, but I am bound to advise honourable senators that the government wishes to have this bill passed by the end of the year.

When it became apparent that we would not receive the bill until Wednesday, I asked why it required passage by the end of the year, and the reasons I was given I shall put on the record in a moment so that all honourable senators can read them tomorrow, since we do not have to deal with this matter until Wednesday when the bill is received. One reason most honourable senators are familiar with is that a number of the measures proposed in the tax legislation affect 1983 T-1 returns filed by low and middle-income taxpayers. Typically, because they receive refunds they file their tax returns early.

Revenue Canada normally issues the first refunds during the month of February. So, for that good reason, it would be highly desirable to have this bill passed before Parliament adjourns for Christmas.

The more significant change proposed is to the child tax credit. I will not go into much detail, but it is estimated that over 3 million taxpayers will be affected by that change in 1983. There are also the employment expense deduction, which would benefit approximately 1.5 million low-income earners, and the child care expenses measure which, it is estimated, will affect 500,000 taxpayers.

The deduction of up to $10,000 in taxable income for the purchase of newly constructed homes will affect 250,000 taxpayers, and the investment tax credit will affect approximately 150,000 taxpayers. Approximately 10,000 farmers and fishermen will be affected by the technical amendment altering the manner in which investment tax credits are claimed.

In terms of information I have received separately, one of the most important reasons the three parties in the other place have agreed to complete this matter before the end of the year touches on the scientific research and development tax credit. I understand that important benefits—important enough to affect the solvency of some larger companies in that field—will be given to those companies and that the banks do not wish to advance credit unless those amendments are passed.

I have not received any more detail than that. Those, in any event, are some of the changes to be made, if the bill is passed. There are other amendments, but the number of taxpayers affected by those other amendments is not added to the numbers I gave you earlier. These figures do not pile up on top of each other, because some of them overlap. The estimate I asked for and was given was that approximately 3 million taxpayers will be involved in these changes.

That puts us in a very undesirable squeeze. Those of us who have been here for some time will not find it unusual to have this kind of pressure put on us at this time of the year, but this year the pressure itself is unusual in that we had planned to adjourn on December 21, but we will not receive the bill until the close of that day; so it is obvious that a lot of pressure is being put on us.

Honourable senators might be wondering why we should stay if the other place must adjourn on December 21. I am advised that the House of Commons cannot adjourn, because, if it does adjourn, under its rules it cannot resume until January 16, but, if it does not adjourn, then Wednesday continues, so to speak, so that we can complete our consideration and the members of the House of Commons can participate in Royal Assent.

I do not find it particularly enjoyable to tell honourable senators that that is the pressure we are going to be under on Wednesday afternoon, but I thought the least I could do—

Hon. Martial Asselin: This is not the first time.

Senator Frith: No, this is not the first time.

Senator Asselin: That is usual for the Senate.

Senator Frith: As I just tried to explain, Senator Asselin, it is not at all unusual for us to be put in this position; all I tried to do was underline that the pressure is unusually high this year.

Senator Asselin: Are you saying we should teach them a lesson?

Senator Frith: All I can do is be very frank and honest with you. That is exactly how the matter stands, and that is why I wanted to give honourable senators as much notice as possible and not spring this on them on any shorter notice than I have already given.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would be less than frank, if I were to say that I am surprised the Senate is faced with a conundrum of this sort in the last days of this year, because, as Senator Asselin has stated, it has become a custom, a practice—and it is a very bad practice—to present deadlines to the Senate which are not of its making.

While I appreciate the sympathetic tone in which the Acting Leader of the Government has presented this problem to us, I have to tell him that he has a lot more influence on the other side than I have. However, I am willing to get behind him and push, if it will help him to bring home to the managers of the business in the House of Commons the unfairness of the request that they are making of this house to deal with a matter in such a hasty fashion. I have no objection that the subject matter of the bill be sent to committee for pre-study. We have done that before and we will probably do it again. Therefore, I am not opposing that part of my honourable friend's proposal; I am prepared to support it; but I am certainly not prepared this evening to give an opinion on what we should do.

First of all, I have not seen the bill. I do not think anybody in the opposition has seen the bill yet. I doubt whether the government has seen it. From the abbreviated second reading, which my honourable friend treated us to with respect to what is in it, I have formed one conclusion and that is that it is an important bill. If it affects 3 million taxpayers of this country, it has to be a very important bill. If there are half a dozen different clauses with respect to different categories of taxpayers, you underline again the significance of the legislation which we are asked to deal with. Subject, of course, to more knowledge when I actually see the legislation, I think it is unreasonable that we should be confronted with this bill for first reading late in the afternoon on Wednesday, when, according to any previous information we have had, we were expecting to conclude our session before the Christmas holiday.

I should like to tell my honourable friend that I am quite willing to give consideration to the inference contained in his proposal, that is, that we pass it this week or else, and I am quite willing to examine it with as open a mind as I can bring to this questions. However, I think that the credibility of the Senate is something that must concern us all. If we are nothing but a formality to be got through as quickly as possible, obviously, that does not reflect in a favourable way on our reason of existence. "Sober second thoughts," they say. Well, you require a little time for sober second thoughts. It seems to me that we would be subject to some criticisms, if we bowed to the pressure that is being attempted to be imposed upon us. I do not blame my honourable friend. I do not think he is doing any pressuring, but I have to tell him that he is our bulwark, and if he does not stand up to those fellows over there, I do not know what we can do about it. I promise him that, if he does take a stand, I will support him to the hilt.

With respect to the issue before us this evening, my reaction is that I do not oppose its being referred to committee tomorrow, but I think that, not having seen the bill, it is premature to come to any conclusions on how to handle it. It is particularly premature, when it is not even in our house in any official way. I propose to reserve any decisions that we may have with respect to leave, or matters of that kind, until we know more about the issue with which we are faced. I should like to reiterate that there is some disposition on all sides of the house to take this matter very seriously and to see if we cannot come to a common stand on the way in which we should treat this particular piece of legislation. If it were something relatively innocuous, there would be no reason to be overzealous in dealing with the forms of Parliament; but when it is a bill that concerns 3 million people in a wide category of different taxpayers, that is something which I want to know something about. It may well be that, in our committee, we will want to hear what people have to say. If by any chance the House of Commons amends its proposition—and that has happened before—and in the closing hours of Wednesday we receive an amended bill, where will that leave us, not having had any opportunity to consider those amendments? That may not happen this time, but it certainly has happened before with respect to tax matters, and it would be wise to take that possibility into consideration.

I thank my honourable friend for his candour in exposing the problem to us, but so far as we are concerned on this side we will wait a while before deciding what we should do.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we cannot reasonably ask for anything more than what Senator Roblin has proposed. I appreciate that he has separated the motion from the advice I gave as to the state of play. Of course, I am not asking honourable senators to do anything with the bill; I am merely letting them know in advance what the situation will be so that they can think about it and give it consideration. I ask only that we pass the motion to refer it to committee, and then give thought—

Senator Asselin: You are only asking that we pass the motion this evening?

Senator Frith: That is correct, because we do not have the bill yet, as Senator Roblin said. All I did in the second part of my exposé was to try to give honourable senators as much notice as possible, without asking them to give any undertaking at all, and, quite reasonably, Senator Roblin gave none; and I would not have expected that he should.

[Senator Roblin.]

I ask honourable senators to support the motion and simply to give consideration to the other aspects, and, hopefully, we can get together with some solutions.

Senator Asselin: Now we start the fight.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, before we deal with the motion, may I say that Senator Roblin has spoken very eloquently, as he always does; Senator Frith has spoken eloquently, too, giving many reasons why this bill should go ahead. However, can Senator Frith give us the reasons for the government's poor planning in bringing this bill forward at this point in time, and for the house leaders in the other place saying that they are going to have 20 minutes each to debate it in the other place and then whip it through? Then, they are going to shunt it over to this place at the last minute. I do not mind staying longer than was anticipated. Senator Asselin and other honourable senators who spent years in the other place will recall getting back to our constituencies on Christmas Eve. So I am not complaining about that. However, if we proceed in this manner, the first thing we will read in the press and hear from those in the other place—not a word about how short a time they dealt with it—will be that it came to this chamber and was whistled through, that we did not discuss it thoroughly.

Cannot Senator Frith endeavour to find out why we cannot handle such business more efficiently? It seems to me that every Christmas recess, every Easter recess and every summer break the same story unfolds from the government in power. They keep saying, "Be good boys and girls in the other place and be good boys and girls in this place; put everything through in a great hurry; don't examine it thoroughly; and we will let you go home!"

I think Senator Roblin is quite correct in saying that a tremendous amount of thought has to be given to this bill, and perhaps we could bring the other place back for Royal Assent on New Year's Eve or New Year's Day. It might be in order.

Senator Frith: I do not think I can add anything.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the committee to which the subject matter of Bill C-2 has just been referred will be meeting at 9.30 tomorrow morning, and I had made tentative arrangements, which I can now confirm, to have the committee meet in Room 356-S. That committee also wishes to sit tomorrow afternoon, and it has arranged for the attendance of its advisors and officials from the department both tomorrow morning and tomorrow afternoon. Therefore, the chairman of the committee has asked me to ask for leave, notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), to move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Tuesday, December 20, 1983, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

● (2150)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps it would be unwise of us to give leave to approve of this matter now. I suggest that the committee meet tomorrow morning and assess the work before it and other matters relevant to the decision. We, on this side, would be prepared to discuss this matter tomorrow afternoon but not this evening.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since leave has not been granted, the matter should be treated as a notice of motion and appear under Motions tomorrow.

Honourable senators, I am advised that two of the committees, whose composition we approved earlier on Senator Petten's motion, will be holding organization meetings tomorrow.

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration will hold an organization meeting at 12 noon in Room 260-N.

Senator Asselin advises me that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will hold an organization meeting tomorrow at 11 a.m. in Room 256-S.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will hold a full meeting at 9.30 a.m., whereas the other two committee meetings will be of an organizational nature.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if the meeting of the Internal Economy Committee is an organizational one, it means that it does not have pressing business before it. Therefore, I would like to suggest that it choose another time.

I have to say, quite frankly, that our caucus meets at 12 noon tomorrow, and we will not be able to attend that committee meeting. Therefore, if it meets the convenience of the respective chairmen, I should like to suggest that it meet at a later time. We will probably have lots of time on Tuesday afternoon.

Senator Frith: I know, honourable senators, that the Internal Economy Committee has some urgent business to deal with tomorrow, but I am not sure that it is necessary for it to do so at 12 noon. I do not know whether Senator Graham, the past chairman of that committee, can help us in any way. I do know that there is some pressing business regarding budgets still under consideration by the committee that he had the honour to chair during the last session. Perhaps he can help us.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have no authority to speak as chairman of any committee, but I can make the suggestion, as a member of the committee that was approved earlier this evening, that the committee meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning with respect to the organizational aspects.

I know that the revised budget of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform must be approved by the Internal Economy Committee. I am sure members of the committee would like to get under way with dealing with that particular budget as early as possible.

If it is agreeable to honourable senators on the other side, I am sure that the members of the committee would agree that it would be convenient to meet at 11 o'clock for a very short time.

Senator Roblin: I hate to be a nuisance on this matter, but I think that is unreasonable. If the Banking Committee meets at 9.30, and the Foreign Affairs Committee at 11.30, there will be some problem if this committee meets at 11 o'clock. What is to prevent the committee meeting after the Senate rises on Tuesday afternoon? That seems to me to be a reasonable proposition, and I suggest it for consideration.

Senator Frith: The problem is that the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources wishes to meet when the Senate rises tomorrow.

Honourable senators, perhaps we cannot settle this matter in the chamber. However, since requests have been made, perhaps the concerns of Senator Roblin will be taken into consideration by those organizing these committees to see that overlapping does not occur.

Senator Graham: For clarification, on behalf of the members of the committee, perhaps it would be in order to have the organization meeting at 1.30 p.m., if that would suit the Acting Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Roblin: I think that is very accommodating. I would be glad to accept that proposal.

Senator Frith: Therefore, honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider the subject matter of Bill C-2; the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will have an organization meeting at 11 a.m.; the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration will meet at 1.30 p.m.; and the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will meet when the Senate rises.

Senator Roblin: That is better.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 20, 1983

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

MR. HABIB THIAM, PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF SENEGAL, AND MRS. THIAM

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of Mr. Habib Thiam, President of the National Assembly of Senegal, and Mrs. Thiam. Mr. Thiam is also President of the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française. Last night, Mr. Thiam, as chancellor of the Ordre de la Pléiade, gave the decorations to the recipients of this order, including the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the Honourable Robert Stanfield and the Honourable Gildas Molgat.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Mr. Speaker, honourable senators, with your leave I shall, as vice-chairman of the Canadian chapter of this association, say a few words about our guests and perhaps inform our English-speaking compatriots on the objectives of our international association.

The AIPLF, which stands for Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française, has a membership of parliamentarians from forty countries who use French in their parliamentary proceedings.

The objectives of the association are to promote cultural exchange and use of the French language among our own members and at the international level.

It is also one of our objectives to facilitate the cultural and economic development of our members. Our discussions deal not only with language and communications but also with cultural and economic exchange among the various parliaments, since this is an association for parliamentarians.

This year, we were honoured to have as international President Mr. Habib Thiam, who for several years was a Minister in Senegal and then Prime Minister, under the presidency of Mr. Diouf. With him in the gallery are his wife and Mr. Christian Valentin, one of our African parliamentarians who has worked very hard to promote and expand the use of the French language through the parliaments of this world.

The ambassador of Senegal is also present, accompanied by his wife.

I would like to add that the parliamentary secretary of the association in Senegal, Mr. Seydou Ba, is also with His Excellency Mr. Thiam.

As the Canadian national vice-president of this association, I wish to extend on behalf of the Senate a very cordial welcome to His Excellency, with the assurance that the Senate fully understands the purpose and objectives of our association. We wish him a very pleasant stay here in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (GERALD HARVEY FUDGE AND AUDREY MARIE SAUNDERS)—FIRST READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc presented Bill S-2, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Gerald Harvey Fudge and Audrey Marie Saunders.

Bill read first time.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday, January 16, 1984.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt this motion?

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have not heard the date which Senator Leblanc has suggested for second reading.

Senator Leblanc: I suggested January 16, 1984, because the House of Commons will return on that date. If for whatever reason the Senate does not sit on that day, second reading would take place as soon as we return.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I should like to explain that although the date of January 16, 1984, has been chosen, it should not be inferred automatically that the Senate will return on January 16. That date has been chosen because it is the date on which the other place should return, under its Standing Orders. For the time being, we are planning to return either on January 23 or 24; the bill, therefore, will be automatically placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on the date of our return.

Senator Asselin: That is why I am asking if it would not have been easier to place this bill on the Orders of the Day for second reading on the date of our return, namely, January 24. Is there any reason why second reading should not be set on the date of our return?

Senator Frith: We have not yet decided when the Senate will return. The date of our return, for the time being, is the one which has been suggested, although it has been discussed in the House. The decision is not yet final. I have no objection for the second reading to take place on January 24, even if no final decision has been made concerning the date of our return.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, would it not be advisable to have the resolution framed in those terms so that it could be called whenever it was appropriate in terms of our own plans? If the date is fixed as January 16 and the Senate does not sit on that day, then what becomes of the order of the Senate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have received an opinion I asked for, for the reasons stated by Senators Asselin and Roblin. If the Senate does not sit on the sixteenth, I am advised that the result will be that this resolution will appear on the Orders of the Day on whatever date we do return. I have no difficulty with January 23 or 24, if Senator Leblanc wishes to change the date.

I wish to make it clear that this does not mean we are now settling that we will return on January 23 or 24. It is up to Senator Leblanc, if he wishes, to change the date.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, if you want me to change the proposed date for second reading, I have no objection. Furthermore, as Senator Frith said, both parties have not yet agreed on a date. Now, January 16 will not necessarily become the official date. We simply chose that date because the House of Commons will return on January 16.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, whatever date is chosen, chances are that we will sit on the 24th.

Senator Asselin: The opposition closes the session, as the saying goes, the government reopens it. The honourable senator should know the date of our return.

Senator Frith: We only want to set the date for the second reading of the bill.

Senator Leblanc: Under the circumstances, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on January 24, 1984.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (LOUIS-PHILIPPE NADEAU AND THÉRÈSE RITA BRULÉ)—FIRST READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc presented Bill S-3, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Louis-Philippe Nadeau and Thérèse Rita Brulé.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday, January 16, 1984.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I make the same remarks as for the previous bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Now, it is January 24.

Senator Asselin: It seems to me that Senator Leblanc said January 16.

Senator Leblanc: I did say January 16, but if you insist on January 24, I have no objection whatsoever. As to the other two bills I will introduce in a few minutes, I can move that they too be placed on the Orders of the Day for January 24.

Senator Asselin: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Senator Leblanc: Under the circumstances, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, January 24, 1984.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

● (1410)

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we have agreed that we shall postpone second reading on all four of these bills until January 24 next.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (ERNEST HODEL AND NORMA DORA LAURIE)—FIRST READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc presented Bill S-4, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Ernest Hodel and Norma Dora Laurie.

Bill read the first time.

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, January 24, 1984.

Motion agreed to.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (BENJAMIN JOSHEPH ANDRADE AND HEATHER WINNIFRED ANDRADE)—FIRST READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc presented Bill S-5, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Benjamin Josheph Andrade and Heather Winnifred Andrade.

Bill read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I think the sponsor of the bill ought to give us an explanation on the nature of those bills. For instance, is this a case of an uncle wanting to marry his niece?

Senator Leblanc: Allow me to introduce the fourth bill, then I will be pleased to answer you.

So, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, January 24, 1984.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Asselin: Before we adopt the motion, honourable senators, I would ask the sponsor of the bill to give us an explanation about the four bills he has just presented for first reading.

Senator Leblanc: In three cases, honourable senators, uncles want to marry their niece, for whatever reason. In the other case, an aunt wants to marry her nephew. When this bill comes up for second reading, I will be available to provide satisfactory explanations to all senators, with a view to making those people happy. We thought we would offer them a Christmas gift by presenting the bill for first reading immediately.

Senator Asselin: A Christmas gift!

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a report approving the budget of the Special Committee on Senate Reform.

STANDING COMMITTEES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEES TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That for the duration of the present session and pursuant to rule 76(3), any select committee may meet during an adjournment of the Senate which exceeds a week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am disturbed that so many of these motions are made requesting leave. It seems to me that that is an abuse of the process. The reason we require a notice of motion is in order to allow honourable senators to give consideration to the proposal made. I am quite willing to admit that some of these proposals could be handled quite expeditiously as they are not all that difficult to understand. Unless there is a good reason why leave should be sought, we ought to proceed in the normal way, despite the fact that a motion like this is perhaps non-controversial. If there is any good reason why we should seek leave today, I am willing to hear it; otherwise, I suggest that we take this notice of motion and discuss it and vote on it tomorrow.

Senator Frith: No problem.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I thought we had agreed several years ago that when leave was being asked for, some explanation should be given. That does not seem to have been the practice lately.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in most cases when I ask for leave I say that I am prepared to give an explanation, and I believe I have said that without exception. I agree that that practice has started, and if I have fallen down in not observing it, it is not intentionally because when leave is being asked for it is very definitely in order that an explanation be asked for and given.

● (1420)

The idea has been discussed on and off over the last few months. There is no reason why we should not look at it further to decide whether we want to change this practice of granting permission to sit during an adjournment of the Senate. As Senator Roblin has suggested, we will treat it as a Notice of Motion, and it will appear as a motion tomorrow.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government) moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I gave notice of this motion yesterday, when Senator Roblin suggested we consider it today. That is my explanation for asking for leave to bring forward the motion appearing in my name under Motions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am beginning to feel rather uncomfortable because every time my honourable friend asks for leave I find it hard to agree with him.

I have a long-standing opinion to the effect that our custom in the Senate to avoid overlapping meetings of committees with sittings of the Senate is good and we should not allow overlapping unless there is some compelling reason.

This is particularly the case today because some of us, at least, want to hear Senator Macdonald's contribution to the Throne Speech debate, which we will be unable to do if this motion is agreed to. Senator Macdonald is, fortunately, one of those men you can rely upon to be brief and to the point. I feel his speech this afternoon will undoubtedly fit that general description; it will not take very long. Therefore, it will not interfere a great deal with the meeting of the committee.

While I do not anticipate an extensive Question Period—if that is bothering my honourable friend, the Acting Leader of the Government—I think it would be appropriate for us to have Question Period, which, as far as I can tell, is going to be short. Then we can immediately proceed to deal with the languages resolution, hear Senator Macdonald, and go off to our committee with a light and easy heart.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that Senator Graham will also be participating in the Throne Speech debate this afternoon. As all honourable senators know, he enjoys the same reputation for clarity, limpidity and succinctness, so I am sure he will not be that long either. Of course, I am in the hands of the Senate. Perhaps Senator Barrow can tell us if some time later than 2.30 p.m. would be satisfactory.

I take it that we are now dealing with the motion itself to allow that committee to meet while the Senate is sitting this afternoon. I have mentioned a time of 2.30 this afternoon, and it seems to me, if I understand Senator Roblin correctly, that the question simply concerns the time the committee should meet and not whether it should have the power to do so.

Can Senator Barrow have leave to explain whether that would work out in a way that would suit Senators Macdonald, Roblin and Graham and the committee members?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend has two things mixed up here. The question before us is the question of leave.

Senator Frith: Leave to bring it forward.

Senator Roblin: The question is one of leave to bring it forward; that is what I am talking about. Until that matter is settled, we do not discuss the substance of the motion. In order to be co-operative and helpful, however, I would suggest that honourable senators agree informally among themselves that they might assert a certain psychological pressure, shall I say, on Senator Macdonald and Senator Graham by agreeing that the committee will meet at 4 o'clock this afternoon for a couple of hours of good work on Bill C-2.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: That is agreeable to me, honourable senators. Although the witnesses are scheduled to appear at 2.30 this afternoon, I will ask them to delay their appearance until 4 o'clock.

Senator Frith: It seems to me, honourable senators, that I can now deal with the motion in due course. I therefore withdraw my request for leave.

Hon. David Walker: Does my friend realize that the government was defeated this morning in the House of Commons on a motion in Committee of the Whole, and is it a fact that the government is seriously considering resigning?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the two questions would properly be brought up in Question Period.

Senator Walker: But this is so serious—it affects your career.

Senator Frith: As soon as Question Period is called, Senator Austin—

Senator Walker: Senator Austin—God forbid!

Senator Frith: As I was saying, honourable senators, Senator Austin and I will try to deal with the very nice parliamentary point raised by my learned friend.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CABINET

STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether the Minister of Transport was speaking for the government when he stated before the Macdonald royal commission that federal projects involving research and development are too often located in what he called Ottawa's "Silicon Valley."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will try to find out.

Senator Murray: At the same time, will the deputy leader try to obtain from the Prime Minister a statement clarifying whether, when ministers appear before the Macdonald royal commission, the rule of cabinet solidarity is somehow placed in suspension? Mr. Axworthy is not the first minister to have appeared before that commission. Several others have done so, including, I believe, the Honourable Don Johnston and the Honourable André Ouellet, expressing what may have been government policy or what may have been personal opinions. Will the deputy leader undertake to obtain a statement from the Prime Minister on that matter?

• (1430)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I recall, two of the cabinet ministers stated that they were speaking for themselves, but I do not remember that being said in the case of Mr. Axworthy. Senator Murray first asked me to try to obtain a statement on the subject, but then, in closing, he asked me to undertake to obtain a statement. I will not undertake to provide a statement, but I shall try to obtain clarification of the matter, which, I think, is the essence of the honourable senator's question.

Senator Murray: I trust the deputy leader is not in the same position as his friend, the Prime Minister of Dominica, who admitted not having our Prime Minister's telephone number.

DISARMAMENT

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVES

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate or, in his absence, to the Minister, Senator Austin. I would like to have some more specific information on the peace mission of the Prime Minister of Canada. We know that last week he met the President of the United States. We have received only bits and pieces of information about this meeting. The press reported that the Prime Minister's reception had been on the cool side, but we don't know. Why not? It is because the Prime Minister embarked on his peace mission without submitting his objectives to Parliament. It would have been very easy for the Prime Minister to obtain a clear mandate from the Canadian people, if he had consulted Parliament on the objectives he was going to pursue, although all parties in Parliament are supporting his peace efforts. The Prime Minister announced in the other House that he had received an invitation from the Soviet leaders to come to Moscow. He would not be able to meet the Secretary of the Communist Party, Mr. Andropov, at this time because of Mr. Andropov's illness. The Prime Minister did not indicate when he would be able to go and whom he would be able to meet when he would at last be able to finish his tour of the capitals of the world. Has the fact that he is unable to go to the Soviet Union at this time, with possibly a message from President Reagan or any other message from the heads of state he has visited, put an end to his peace mission?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regarding the meeting between the President of the United States and our Prime Minister, my impression is not the same as that of Senator Asselin. In my view, the reception was warm and encouraging. Should I receive further details, such as a press conference or other events, I will let my colleague know. According to my information and according to what the Prime Minister said, those are the only facts we know at the present time about this meeting.

As for a mandate, it is my impression the Prime Minister explained his intentions. He received the support of all three parties, as Senator Asselin pointed out. He has been encouraged in his mission by every group in this country, and that is enough. He has received support for his peace mission almost everywhere in Canada.

As for the meeting in the Soviet Union, if I understood the press reports correctly, it was pointed out that the Soviet praesidium had made it clear the Prime Minister was to come on an official visit. On the other hand, Mr. Andropov is unable to set a date for such a meeting because of health problems.

Senator Asselin: Could the Acting Leader confirm a statement by the Prime Minister, which is a bit confusing, to the effect that after meeting with the heads of State of the nuclear powers, he reached the conclusion that they were willing to have round table talks to discuss disarmament? Did I understand the Prime Minister's statement correctly, or does it mean something else? Until now, the Prime Minister has never confirmed that when he visited the heads of state of China, Great Britain, France and the United States, he was very clearly given the assurance that all five nuclear powers were willing to meet to discuss disarmament. Do I understand the Prime Minister correctly when he says those were his conclusions after meeting with the heads of state?

Senator Frith: The words used on the program I heard on the radio this morning were: "Conditional approval". In my view, the five powers mentioned by Senator Asselin agreed on the usefulness of such a meeting. However, approval for participating is subject to certain conditions. That is the impression I received from what I heard this morning. If any details on the conditions of the agreement are available, I will see that you receive them.

Senator Asselin: Could the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate ask the Prime Minister whether he could reveal the conditions set by the heads of state for a summit meeting?

Senator Frith: I will try to get all the details on those conditions.

MARRIAGE ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government. The Senate has just given first reading to four private bills concerning marriage law exemptions. I think it ridiculous that the time of Parliament is taken up with such matters. Would the acting leader attempt to persuade the government to introduce an amendment to the Marriage Act to put in place a procedure for dealing with such exemptions, which would not involve Parliament?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, judging from the applause that greeted Senator Godfrey's question, many honourable senators are of the same opinion. I undertake to raise the question with the government.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE TO HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Message from the House of Commons requesting that a Special Joint Committee be appointed to consider the Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider the Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages;

That all such reports be deemed to have been or to be upon tabling referred to the Committee;

That the following Senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Guay, Murray, Riley, Robichaud and Wood;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to retain professional, clerical and stenographic help as may be required;

That a quorum of the Committee be four members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when three members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, Senator Murray, the distinguished former joint chairman of this joint committee, is with us. I assume the wording meets with his approval and I therefore ask that honourable senators support the motion.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 8, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Bosa, seconded by Senator Hébert, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as I listened to my acting leader, Senator Roblin, telling me what short speeches I make, I must confess that I thought he might be trying to convey a message to me today for some reason or another.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Perhaps he would like them longer.

Senator Macdonald: In participating in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne I wish, first, to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the motion and then to associate myself with the Acting Leader of the Opposition and the Acting Leader of the Government in complimenting them on the excellence of their performance. Speaking personally, I know that Senator Bosa will not mind if I pay a special tribute to Senator Hébert. After all, we have heard Senator Bosa speak at various times and we have come to expect a good speech from him—and, I may add, he never disappoints us. However, it was Senator Hébert's first speech in this chamber and that made it much more difficult for him. As I listened to him, it seemed to me he sounded like a veteran member. Indeed, he made an excellent presentation, he gave an excellent speech. I look forward to hearing him speak many times in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: I also wish to compliment the Acting Leader of the Opposition, Senator Roblin. As is his custom, he gave an impressive address. I thought Senator Frith did exceptionally well, especially when one considers how little of substance he had to speak about.

In making a few comments on the contents of the Speech from the Throne I want to be kind to, and considerate of, the feelings of the government, since I know that no matter how bad its record is—and it is very bad—it is doing the best it can. Thus, I keep in mind two things. First, I do not regard the Speech as a blueprint for either immediate or, indeed, remote action, but rather as a vague, general statement of pious intentions. Second, I regard it chiefly as a pre-election manifesto which in some way or other tries to appeal to all voters. I think the Speech must have been written in the forlorn hope that a kind electorate would overlook and forgive the wretched performance of the government over the past few years, especially its dismal performance in matters affecting the economic life of Canadians.

To be fair, the Speech does contain some matters which, if implemented, deserve support. I suppose all Throne Speeches do. Certainly, the emphasis on youth employment, especially the provision for first-job opportunities, is commendable. I hope legislation to realize this end will be introduced soon. I also welcome the proposal to assist single pensioners by increasing the supplement paid to them, and I hope that proposal, too, will be implemented soon.

I can see great possibilities in two new programs mentioned in the Speech, namely, the incentive to hire Canadians through a national voluntary service and the creation of a conservation co-op to employ Canadians to carry out essential tasks in reforestation and national park development. This could be the beginning of a permanent source of good employment for a large number of people. I look forward with interest to hearing more about these two matters.

Honourable senators, having made all these nice comments about the Speech, in fairness I must make some mild criticism of its contents and lack thereof. I certainly believe that, when the Speech is examined as a whole, any fair-minded person will agree that it is a pretty dismal document. By proclaiming now, even in general terms, all the matters it believes it should proclaim, the government is, in effect, saying one of two things. To this point in time either it has not been aware of the economic and social problems faced by Canadians—especially those Canadians without employment and, in too many cases, with no hope of employment—or it has been aware of them. It is difficult to believe that even this government could be so out of touch with reality as to be unaware of them, but if the government did know of these hardships, then it must stand condemned before the bar of public opinion for not taking massive action before now to remedy, or at least alleviate, the economic evils which have, and are having, a very serious and depressing effect on not only the unemployed but also those who fear the threat of unemployment. With respect to the unemployed we can count as many as two million of our people.

I know that government defenders will say that these hardships were, and are, caused by events beyond the control of the government. They will say they were caused by the policies of the United States and of Japan. They will say they were caused by the policies of the European Community and the policies of many other countries. Yet, when the rate of inflation was reduced and, indeed, substantially reduced, we were told over and over again that such a reduction was the result of the policies of the Canadian government. There was no mention then of the policies of the United States, Japan or any other country. If inflation was reduced as a result of the policies of this government, then, to be logical, inflation was caused by the policies of this government. If this is not admitted, then the government must stand condemned for not using its power and ability to reduce inflation long ago—in fact, before it laid such a heavy burden on the Canadian people.

Personally, I feel that at least some of the causes of inflation were the result of fiscal policy exercised by the government through the Bank of Canada. I think some of the credit for reducing inflation can also be claimed by the government. However, I do think the government is responsible for allowing the evil of inflation to add to, and be responsible for, many of the hardships suffered by Canadians, especially by those two million who are without work. The government cannot have it both ways. If it could cure inflation, as its defenders claim, and yet did not do so, then it must take the blame and be condemned for its lack of action.

I do not at this time propose to speak at any length on the terrible problem of unemployment. We all know that a great many Canadians are suffering from its evil effects. We know that many unemployed Canadians have used all their unemployment insurance benefits and must seek public welfare and that, in many cases, they find this humiliating, embarrassing and degrading. Yet they have no other choice.

The Throne Speech mentions certain actions the government proposes to take in order to alleviate the problem. It mentions that 353,000 new jobs have been created by the economy during 1983. You will notice, honourable senators, that the Speech says "created by the economy". Until I noticed that wording, I thought that the government was claiming that it had created those jobs by itself, and I was wondering, if it could create that number of jobs, why it had stopped there, because I doubt that that number of new jobs equals the number of old ones which have been lost.

Honourable senators, one cannot be critical of the statement in the Throne Speech that a large proportion of the government job creation expenditures will be devoted to youth employment. However, I must confess I have a great deal of concern and sympathy for the unfortunate older workers people in their late 40s or in their 50s who are now unemployed and have little hope of obtaining employment in the near future or, in too many cases, ever again.

During the depression, as in all economic depressions, there is a drive by management to reduce costs and it usually happens that new methods of production are brought about by the substitution of people by machines of various kinds. We all know the old arguments, of course, in favour of new uses for machines. We are told that more goods are produced at a cheaper rate and that new jobs are created to maintain and service these machines and that that results in a better standard of living. However, the difficulty is that the workers displaced are not, as a rule, those who are hired to operate and maintain the new machines; the older workers and the working poor are the ones who suffer. But the older workers who have lost their employment are not the only ones who suffer; many who are working suffer because they live in a constant state of worry and anxiety that their work, too, may be eliminated. That is why labour unions, professional unions and associations are making such a strong and vigorous battle to save the jobs of their members.

Honourable senators, if I may digress for a moment, I think that one of the surprising things about the effects of this economic depression is that no new ideas have been generated as to how economic depressions can be prevented in the future. While not wanting to appear pessimistic, I think it must be acknowledged that in the ordinary course of events the supply of goods and services will in time exceed the demand, and, if there is not a massive intervention of some kind, this situation will trigger an economic depression. I realize that that is a simplification, but it is generally correct.

In the economic depression of the late 1920s and the 1930s prior to World War II, there were a great many ideas and suggestions put forward as to how economic depressions could be avoided or, at least, minimized. Some of the measures then advocated were: unemployment insurance, family allowances, and the balancing of government budgets only over a period of years so that taxation could be increased in prosperous times and decreased in times of depression. Easier credit arrangements were instituted so that goods could be purchased and paid for over a period of time and, of course, state ownership and controls of one kind or another were also suggested. Many of these measures have been put into effect; as a result, the evil effects of mass unemployment have been greatly alleviated. However, the point I am making is that these measures, in themselves, have not prevented the present economic depression, although they may have postponed it or lessened its effect. As I mentioned, I think it is surprising that no new solutions for the prevention of economic depression have been proposed. I do not know what the answer is, but I hope that someone, somewhere, will come up with a solution.

Honourable senators, while I recognize that there does not appear to be a definite solution to all the economic and social problems caused or intensified by a depression, I think it has to be recognized that people look to government to provide solutions. Government, by taking credit for all job-creation programs, has, in the public view, accepted the responsibility of providing employment or some alternative thereto. In any event, the government must accept the fact that in view of the present economic conditions a massive, determined and persistent effort must be made to overcome the effects of the depression we are enduring.

Personally, I do not think the present government's record is such that it would inspire confidence in its ability to provide the leadership Canada needs at this time. Indeed, honourable senators, I sometimes wonder just what are the priorities of the present government. From the Throne Speech it is difficult to determine. After mentioning the need for youth employment, for example, the Speech goes on to state that the government plans to open up the divorce laws further so that divorces can more easily be obtained. When that legislation comes before us, it will be interesting to learn what organizations, if any, are demanding this measure. Perhaps it is merely the brainchild of one minister or another, wishing to weaken further the concept of family life in Canada. Personally, I do not see how such nonsense deserves a place in a Throne Speech.

Honourable senators, there are two other matters on which I would like to speak briefly, neither of which is related to the Speech from the Throne. Some honourable senators may remember that, many years ago—somewhere between 1930 and 1936—the Government of Canada issued what were known as “perpetual bonds”—bonds which had no date for redemption. They had an interest rate of three per cent, which was the going rate at that time. Not only did those bonds have no redemption date but they had no provision for an interest increase, if general interest rates rose. Consequently, over the years the market value of the bonds became substantially less than their face value. Indeed, in 1974, the market value was approximately $35 for a $100 bond. Later, a redemption date of 1996 was fixed and the market value increased somewhat so that today, it is approximately $45 for a $100 bond.

Honourable senators, incredible as it is, unbelievable as it is, we see a bond of Canada worth less than half of its face value. Personally, I think it is nothing less than a national scandal that people, who, in good faith, lent to Canada $100, should receive back only $45 when their bonds are sold. I think it is a blow to our reputation for financial integrity that that should be the case. You may ask why those bonds have not been redeemed long since at their face value, since, in my understanding, they were the only perpetuums ever issued. The only explanation I have ever heard is that many of these bonds were acquired at low prices by speculators who, in turn, would profit, if the bonds were redeemed. To me, that is a strange theory regarding repayment of loans by government. Deplorable as it may be that speculators should make a profit, I think our national honour requires that justice be done—at least with respect to those who, in good faith, bought the bonds at their face value and still own them. There is no legal obligation on the part of government to do that, but I believe there is a moral obligation. I do not know the total amount of that bond issue, but I expect that it would not be very large in comparison with today's standards. It is surprising to me why those bonds were not redeemed in the great conversion loans of 1958 or in the many bond issues that have been made since then to pay off loans as they have become due.

In any event, honourable senators, I hope that some future Minister of Finance will agree that Canada has a moral obligation towards the holders of these bonds and will take some action to see that justice is done after all these years.

Honourable senators, there is one other matter I would like to put before you, which was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne but which, in my opinion, is worthy of such mention. One government project which I think deserves great praise is the Coast Guard Officer Training Plan of the Canadian Coast Guard. To give you a brief outline of this plan, I should like to quote from a document which describes it. I have a brochure entitled “The Canadian Coast Guard Officer Training Plan,” which was placed in our library on March 16, 1982. In part it reads as follows:

The Canadian Coast Guard, a branch of Transport Canada, has been established to support the safe and efficient conduct of shipping in Canada. The Coast Guard is primarily concerned with the design, crewing and operation of ships; the operation and maintenance of navigational aids; icebreaking support; and, when difficulties do arise, search and rescue. The Coast Guard has several operating branches, the most visible being the Coast Guard Fleet, which concentrates its efforts on servicing aids to navigation, icebreaking and search and rescue. Depending upon their size, Canadian ships, including Coast Guard ships, are operated by certified marine officers. The skills required by these officers are complex and demanding and certification at the first of four levels can only be granted after three years of marine experience and study.

It is for that reason that we have the Canadian Coast Guard College. The article further states:

The Canadian Coast Guard College, founded in 1965, is situated across Sydney Harbour from Sydney, in a residential area. New residences and academic buildings were opened in early 1981. Construction of a new gymnasium and swimming pool began also in 1981, and a new navigation boathouse and marine engineering machine shop are expected to be completed by 1986.

The four-storey academic building contains a 20,000-volume marine library, classrooms and seminar rooms, language training centre and computer centre. There are laboratories for metallurgy, hydraulics, steam and diesel simulation, electricity, electronics, seamanship, aids to navigation,— and the like. The article continues:

Officer-cadets study navigation or marine engineering totally in English or totally in French and, in addition, follow a program of second language development. There is compulsory physical education during each year of study, complemented by an extensive sports program. In addition, several sports and social clubs operate on campus.

Officer-cadets wear Coast Guard uniforms and residence life is highly structured in keeping with the goal of the college to produce competent officers for the Canadian Coast Guard.

The Canadian Coast Guard offers a lifetime career for men and women in a branch of the Public Service concerned with marine matters, particularly safety at sea.

After completing their courses at the college, graduating officers are appointed as junior officers in Coast Guard ships where they serve for three years as watchkeepers, either in the navigation or engineering departments. As they rise in rank and assume greater responsibility, they are assigned to different types of ships where they will broaden their experience and perfect their skills in navigation or engineering, and develop the qualities of leadership and management which will qualify them for more senior appointments in the Coast Guard.

I should also like to quote from a brochure entitled "Coast Guard College", which is published by Transport Canada. It states:

The College accepts 110 new Officer Cadets from across Canada for the training program which starts each August. Applicants may be male or female and must have completed high school including senior level mathematics, senior level physics and one year of training in the second language.

Honourable senators, this college is doing tremendous work and its officers and instructors deserve the highest praise. This is one government project which is devoid of criticism. It receives only the highest praise from those who are aware of the work it carries on. The students come from all across Canada, and to see them on parade, as I have done at various Remembrance Day parades, makes one proud of the young men and women who will be the future officers of the Canadian Coast Guard.

Honourable senators, to go back to the Speech from the Throne, you may have felt that my feelings about it are such that I cannot vote for it. In fact, I think it is a worthless document and I plan to vote against it.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Is there some way we can eliminate this blast of cold, Arctic air that is emanating from behind those honourable senators in this area of the chamber? Unfortunately, Senator Bélisle and I are not in a position to protect our heads from this cold air. I am sure that the temperature is lower than it should be; perhaps the Acting Black Rod or someone else could look into it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understand that the cold air we are suffering from now comes from Labrador, and perhaps Senator Rowe might look into it during the recess. It is exceptionally cold and I think it is testing the capacity of our heating equipment, but we will not consider it as a permanent move, if Senator Bélisle wants to cross over to this side in order to listen to Senator Graham's speech.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Macdonald has shown the way, because I am sure that since he started his speech the chamber has become somewhat warmer; I am also sure that by the time I have concluded my remarks Senator Rowe will be aware not only of an increase in heat but also of comfort if he listens carefully to and digests what I have to say.

[Translation]

First of all, honourable senators, I should like to congratulate our new Speaker very sincerely. Senator Riel has been a friend of mine for a very long time. He has always carried out his duties with the utmost distinction.

I also wish to congratulate Senator Molgat, another friend of old, who has become our Speaker pro tem. He is highly qualified for his new job.

At the same time, we regret Senator Marchand's departure. We shall keep an enduring memory of his extensive experience, personal charm and great courage which surely will be an asset in his new position.

All honourable senators are pleased to hear that Senator Flynn is recovering very well and we are looking forward to his return to the Senate where his wit and cool are severely missed.

[English]

The government leader in this chamber has also joined a rather exclusive club, commonly known as the "Bypass Club." As a club it is quite unique. There has never been a membership drive nor do the members compete or try to over-achieve, but thanks to the remarkable skills of our medical profession and the determined resilience of the patients, Senator Olson will soon again take his proper place in the Senate.

Like others before me, I want to congratulate both acting leaders in this chamber, Senator Frith and Senator Roblin, who, in the absence of their respective leaders, have performed their duty in their usual exemplary manner. I want to congratulate those who have preceded me in this debate, whatever their views. I am particularly pleased with Senator Macdonald's reference to the excellent facilities provided to train cadets and future officers at the Canadian Coast Guard in our home area.

Honourable senators, over the past year, we have been coming out of an economic downturn that has been described either as a deep recession or, as some would have it, a real depression. Most certainly, it would have been a serious depression had it not been for the many social safety nets which, unfortunately, were not in place in the horrendous days of the late 1920s and the early 1930s.

I believe that the recession has shown us more clearly than ever before what we must do in order to regain our economic stride. The recession was, in all respects, a staggering blow; it was an experience much worse than most of us could have anticipated. Yet, this country came through it with a degree of toughness and resilience that has given heart, strength and confidence to our combined recovery efforts.

I believe it is accurate to say that in the past Canada has had the greatest economic recovery of any country in the world. In terms of growth, we are expecting to be able to report that in 1983 we had, and in 1984 hopefully will have, the largest real growth of any of the summit countries. Just recently the U.S. Conference Board noted that Canada has achieved the largest and most dramatic economic rebound of any country in the world.

Towards this end, in the first half of 1983 the Canadian economy grew at an annual rate of 7.5 per cent. It is hoped that these trends will lead to economic growth rates among the largest, if not the largest, of any industrial nation. The OECD has projected that the Canadian economic recovery will be the strongest among the seven largest industrialized countries in 1984.

We have also had the largest decline in inflation. In fact, speaking of over-achievements, we have over-achieved with respect to targets with the present rate, as you know, at 4.9 per cent. Among other economic indicators, it is interesting to note that consumer confidence in Canada is at its highest level in 18 years.

Just recently, a survey of 80 top U.S. industrial corporations by McGraw Hill Economics reported that their foreign capital spending was expected to decline during the next three years, but that there are two very significant exceptions: increases are expected in the European Economic Community and in Canada—13 per cent in the EEC and 21 per cent in Canada.

As many economists tell us, we are entering a new economic age. There are some very important things that we should keep in mind as we enter into this age. The new economy is producing goods and services at a very different employment level. The production of the economies of the western world has exceeded pre-downturn levels, but still some 25 million to 30 million people are left unemployed in the western world.

For those who suggest that we should look at Japan's economic performance as the ideal barometer—Senator Macdonald made reference to Japan—their 1983 unemployment rate reached 3.8 per cent, which is actually 2.5 times the normal unemployment rate for that country. That is a clear indication that the unemployment phenomenon is world-wide. Most importantly, it indicates that we are entering a new economic era—an era that may produce the highest standard of living, never dreamed of before, but at a cost of marginalizing some 10 per cent of the potential labour force of not only Canada but of the entire western world. Particularly badly hurt are the new entrants into the labour force, most of whom are under 25 years of age.

In addition, as Senator Macdonald noted, there are those over 45 and 50 years of age whose skills may have become obsolete and are no longer needed in the new economic society. We must be aware of the potential disaster for the western world if we ignore the victims of this new age, an age that has been most commonly labelled "high-tech." No greater task awaits those who are responsible for policy decisions than to find ways to alleviate the potential misery of those who will not fit into the new age.

It may be just a coincidence that we are at George Orwell's 1984. It is important that a way be found for all sectors to become involved in searching out answers to the dilemma. To devise the strategies which, hopefully, will produce the solutions, all sectors must work in concert and in harmony.

I also find it interesting to note that, in 1983, there were two conferences in Canada which looked at the so-called "new society." At the conference in Montreal in the early summer, the human effect of high-tech was listed as the No. 10 priority and, hence, hardly worthy of debate. At the conference held in October here in the city of Ottawa, the human effects were greeted with what could, at best, be described as studied indifference.

One of the reasons that high unemployment is so dangerous is that our concept of safety nets for economic victims is really only valid when we are looking at something less than 5 per cent of the work force being displaced at any one time. When structural unemployment is mired at 10 to 11 per cent, as is the case at present, there is less hope that there can be any kind of permanent, effective safety net.

Another potential, but very real, danger is that when employment of the individual becomes endangered those who still have jobs become less and less willing to share their affluence through tax contributions which really provide the safety net. These people see themselves endangered and develop a survival-of-the-fittest mentality.

Therefore, I think it important that we look at economic issues from a very realistic point of view, and, in doing this, we must understand that unemployment may remain abnormally high perhaps for the best part of the present century. That is my own view at present.

Let us also understand that there are no quick fixes. It is cold comfort for us to realize that the last time we were faced with such massive unemployment was when we came out of the depression of the 1930s. History reminds us that we were able to do little with high unemployment until well into World War II. We reached the target of full employment in 1942. That, as you well know, was at the cost of millions of lives and the wanton destruction of large parts of Europe. In our day we are reminded that war is not an alternative; that no sane person believes it is possible to enter into a nuclear conflict without destroying the world.

It becomes evident, then, that more than at any previous time in our history we, as a society, must seriously deliberate on the problem of unemployment. It is urgent that we begin these deliberations without being tied to rhetoric and stereotypes that were only valid at another time and in another age.

We have to seriously look at sharing work, at sharing employment, and sharing income. We have to find novel ways to employ people. These novel ventures must provide work that enables the worker to feel that he or she is making a real contribution to the well-being of the community, and the community must see that work as having a social and economic value.

There is a number of ways in which this problem might be approached, and I will present a few as being merely indicative rather than exhaustive. We have to consider shorter work weeks, on-the-job training and development, and job sharing. We have to find ways to incorporate the informal economy into the formal without destroying the present incentives that allow the informal economy to play a role in our society. We have to find some way to detach ourselves from the fixation that work days ought to extend from 9 to 5, and look at the possibility of the adjustment of work schedules to the needs of individuals, of families and of communities. We must understand that the present rate of unemployment places it beyond the reach of government to do any more than apply "band-aid" approaches. Hence, we must find the means by which to allow these limited tax dollars to play a significant role in solving the problems of unemployment.

As was indicated in the Speech from the Throne, the government has set aside millions of dollars for job creation projects. This is highly commendable and highly necessary at this time, but, again, the "quick fix" is not the long-term answer. We must be realistic. We must understand that we cannot marginalize 10 per cent of the population without creating the possibility of massive social unrest. Even if this unrest is not manifested in our society today, we must certainly ask ourselves how long we can permit any form of economic exploitation to go on without its causing social unrest.

Closer to my own backyard, honourable senators, I should like to say a word about two economic institutions in the Cape Breton region that have been much maligned at various periods of our history. These institutions were set up to alleviate very heavy unemployment in the Cape Breton region. While unemployment is still a severe problem, these institutions have done much to at least stabilize the economy.

I will turn first to Sysco, the provincially-owned steel corporation. Honourable senators are all aware that recently a tragic accident took the lives of three men, injured two others and caused extensive damage. Last night in this chamber I had occasion to express, on behalf of all honourable senators, a message of deep sympathy to the bereaved families. This is just another example of the misfortune that has stalked the corporation for more than a decade.

Honourable senators, I think it is very important to understand that, in the three months preceding that accident, the corporation had at least been paying its way in operations, even if it had not been able to make a dent in its serious capital deficit. I am given to understand that, leaving aside interest and capital costs, Sysco has been able to operate on its own for the past year without any infusion of provincial money to cover those operations. This, of course, is a magnificent tribute to the high degree of co-operation and hard work at the levels of both the work force and management.

[Senator Graham.]

As phase one of the business plan comes to a close, the Sydney Steel Corporation will be in desperate need of the approval of the next stage of rehabilitation. As decisions for this phase are being taken, some very hard economic decisions will also have to be made to determine the future shape of the corporation. It is important that these decisions be made with the understanding that at the end of the tunnel there will exist a plant that will be able to play a vital economic role, not only in the local but also in the Atlantic and the national economies. We are aware that it may not be the original role that was once promoted, but that it will be a true cornerstone for the development of the Cape Breton region.

The other cornerstone of the Cape Breton economy has been the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which was established by the Government of Canada in 1967. Much has also been written about Devco and its problems. There are some economic realities that we must keep in mind when we discuss Devco's business. Some weeks ago, the president of Devco spoke in Halifax about problems with respect to the deficit facing the corporation. He pointed out that, at the present time, Devco sells 1.5 million tons of coal to the Nova Scotia Power Corporation. The power corporation paid about $65 million for this coal. What is important to note is that this 1.5 million tons replaced 6.3 million barrels of offshore oil which would have cost more than $200 million. One ton of coal replaces four barrels of oil. When we look at the present world price of oil—which is approximately $28 to $33 per barrel, depending upon whether one is dealing in Canadian or United States currency—according to these calculations, a ton of coal is therefore worth approximately $112 or more.

What is most significant is that the money spent on coal stays in Canada. For every dollar of coal revenue, 90 cents accrues as domestic Canadian income, as spin-offs reverberate through the economy. Only 10 cents is lost to the offshore.

Honourable senators, I am not going to enter into the debate on coal prices at this time, but I think that it is important for the people of Canada to be aware that the coal miner makes a substantial contribution to the national economy. Since Devco came to Cape Breton, it has had the major job of refurbishing a capital-starved industry. It also faced a labour force eminently skilled for the industry in the first half of the twentieth century, but, with new technology and equipment, a much different industry evolved.

Because Devco is a crown corporation, it not only has to be a realistically economic industry but it also has a social contract with the community that can only be denied if we are prepared to go back to the industrial society that existed in the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Thus, Devco must pay competitive wages; it must provide for those who are marginalized in the industry and are on either pre-retirement or compassionate leave. It has also been contracted by the provincial government to pay for lung dysfunction. It has the responsibility to modernize, with minimum short-term dislocation, in order that the stability of the communities involved be maintained. It is hoped that all of these objectives can be achieved through a significant degree of co-operation and understanding between management, labour and the various levels of government.

Honourable senators, over the past couple of years we have all awaited, with varying degrees of optimism, the so-called Kirby report on the fisheries of eastern Canada. The report has been under constant review at both the federal and provincial levels, and as decisions are made and agreements are being concluded it is important for us to look at the basic issues.

One of the most important things for us to understand is that in many areas nature has decreed that the fishery should be a seasonal industry. In recent times there have been some notable pockets of prosperity, but perhaps more significant are the large areas of poverty. Few have done well, whether they be the fishermen, those working for the company, those working for the processor or those working in the fish plants. At almost every level the return has been too little. It is also true that, because of the recession, larger and larger numbers of people return to fishing just to get sufficient income to maintain themselves in an adverse economic climate.

As many honourable senators are aware, particularly those from the coastal provinces, the history of the fishery has been a history of boom and bust, of insufficient capital to adjust to new technology, and of insufficient return on capital to bring in new investment. Hence there is a need, at periodic intervals, for so-called government bailouts. What is needed at this time is a comprehensive plan that will restore long-term stability. This will not be possible unless the program is adequately financed by both the private and the public sectors.

There is no doubt that the fishery on the Atlantic coast can have hope for a new age and a new prosperity; but I emphasize that the ad hoc solutions of yesterday can never be the positive reality of today and tomorrow. We require, with great urgency, long-term, medium-term and short-term policies and programs.

Where do we want the Canadian fishery to be in the year 2000, 1995, 1990, or even 1985, and what are our reasonable expectations at home and abroad? In Atlantic Canada the fishery should be the most consistent and stable of all of our resource industries, and together we have a responsibility; we must be strong in our commitment to work towards that end.

I wish to say a word about housing, because I believe it to be the sector that has been most harrassed by the economic downturn. Indeed, output in this sector was reduced from close to 200,000 units in the early 1970s to approximately 100,000 in 1982.

We have to be aware that part of this downturn was caused by the fact that the demand for housing dropped because of what some called slower family formation, as well as slower growth in terms of population. These are but two of the indicators. But the real problem was the interest rates that caused such havoc in the economy over the past few years. Not only were they outrageously high, but it appeared that there was no top limit, and thus housing declined to new lows.

The question is asked: What policies are needed in order to stabilize the housing industry, which is one of the key sectors in our present economy? We must understand that housing is the sector that most responds to changes in government policy and interest rate structures. Discussions between government and industry have been held to find a way to protect the population against upward swings in interest rates during the term of a mortgage. Hopefully, this approach will be successful and people will be able to undertake longer term mortgages without the fear of being dispossessed of their investment. That would go a long way towards stabilizing the industry.

The second problem concerns those who are unable to acquire housing in the conventional market. That difficulty is one that has also been undergoing considerable study by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Poor housing costs governments and society at all levels, in respect of economic costs, and the social and psychological costs of poor housing condemn large numbers of people to poverty. This merits the deep concern and careful attention of all those who are in a position to provide solutions.

Finally, honourable senators, I wish to say a word about the peace initiative, because, having said all this, unless we can stop the drift towards war or a nuclear holocaust, the aforementioned problems and potential solutions are merely academic.

The breakdown of negotiations on the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks has raised the danger index throughout the world. The very survival of humanity is at stake, and we and our children wonder why the nations of the world cannot reach agreement on ways to share our planet in peace.

Every nation, as well as every group of nations, has a duty to help create those conditions of stability which will allow all of our people to look forward to a lasting peace. The key, in my judgment, is the rigid determination of governments around the world to use their latent political influence upon arms negotiations and upon the attitudes and policies of the super powers.

As the Prime Minister has said, Canada, like other nations, does not sit at the negotiating table with the United States and the Soviet Union. But that does not mean that our interests and our lives are not on the table. Consequently, the need to reassert political control is all the more pressing.

This debate is taking place at a time when Canada must look to the future with the necessary courage to face serious challenges to the wellbeing of our own country and of the world at large. It is a time for governments to govern with conviction, for all leaders to lead with clarity of vision, for all political parties to put before the people a clear set of principles, policies and priorities.

I am confident that all honourable senators support the peace initiatives of our Prime Minister and, with God's help, together we must succeed.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-2

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I have an oral report to make on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On April 19, 1983, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Finance, delivered in the House of Commons a budget which forms the basis of the matters before the committee. By Order of Reference of December 19, 1983, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matters relating thereto.

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your committee has considered the subject matter of Bill C-2. In connection with such consideration, the committee engaged the services of Mr. Helmut Birk, C.A., and retained as its counsel, Mr. Thomas S. Gillespie, and has heard evidence from Mr. R. A. Short, General Director, Tax Policy and Legislation Branch, and other officials from the Department of Finance.

The bill contains measures designed to stimulate the recovery of Canada's economy and to restore the economic capacity to generate new jobs. These measures are designed to encourage and enable Canadian enterprises to undertake new investment more quickly. Some of the more important features of the bill are as follows:

Business losses can now be carried back one year and forward five years to reduce income subject to tax. Under clause 55, at page 98 and forward, losses are to be carried back three years and forward seven years. For farmers and fishermen, the carry-forward period will be 10 years rather than seven years. Taxpayers will be allowed a three-year carry-back of capital losses. Transitional rules are provided allowing for the gradual introduction of these measures.

Investment tax credit: A number of temporary and permanent changes to the investment tax credit provisions have been introduced to support investment. The investment tax credit is now earned at the general rate of 7 per cent; 10 per cent in pre-designated areas; 20 per cent in the Atlantic and Gaspé regions; and 50 per cent for certain manufacturing investments in special DREE regions.

It is proposed under subclause 73(4) that the credit be extended at a rate of 7 per cent to prescribed new heavy construction equipment. Under the present rules, the investment tax credit can only be claimed to the extent of $15,000 plus one-half of federal tax in excess of $15,000. Unused credits could be carried forward for five years.

The bill proposes, in subclause 73(2), that taxpayers be able to use their investment tax credit to reduce, without limitation, their federal tax payable. Credits will be allowed to be carried back for three years and forward for seven years.

Furthermore, under clause 74, the investment tax credit earned on investments made between April 19, 1983, and May 1, 1986, will be refunded if they cannot be used. For small business corporations and unincorporated businesses, the refund will be 40 per cent of the unused credit in the year; for other businesses, it will be 20 per cent.

Share purchase tax credit: This new credit, to be provided for in the new section 127, is designed to assist corporations in raising equity to finance new investment projects. This measure will permit corporations to use tax credits earned on new investments to attract purchasers of new common shares issued between July 1, 1983 and the end of 1986. Private and public corporations will be allowed to issue shares which will entitle the first purchasers thereof to a tax credit of up to 25 per cent of the issue price paid. Certain tax exempt entities such as pension plans, which would otherwise not be able to make use of the credit, will have the share credit refunded to them in cash. The credit will reduce the tax cost of the shares for the purpose of computing subsequent capital gains and losses.

Research and development: The tax incentives presently in the act are:

- (1) One hundred per cent deduction for current and capital expenditures,
- (2) Fifty per cent additional deduction on same expenditures in excess of the average for the three prior years, and
- (3) A tax credit of 10 per cent, 20 per cent for the Atlantic provinces and Gaspé regions, and 25 per cent for small business corporations.

The bill proposes that the 50 per cent additional allowance be eliminated and that the tax credit be increased by 10 per cent from the current level of all R & D performers. The credit will be eligible for the longer three-year carry-back and seven-year carry-forward, and for the temporary measure that refunds a part of the credit to businesses with no tax otherwise payable.

Corporations will be entitled to renounce unused credits and deductions by permitting outside investors a tax credit. This will be provided for under the new section 127.3. The investors will be entitled to claim a credit of 50 per cent of the amount provided to the researcher. In turn, the researcher will renounce its rights to the tax deductions and credits.

Indexed security investment plans: The bill introduces the ISIP. Clause 18—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I wonder what the honourable senator is doing now? Is he giving a report of his committee? Is he making a speech? What is he doing?

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, I am giving an oral report of the committee.

Senator Asselin: Why did he not table the report first?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think this procedure is in order under rule 78(3). This is the report on a pre-study of a bill, and is therefore offered for information. After the report has been given, it can be laid on the Table. It is often left at that. However, on motion it may be placed on the Orders of the Day for future consideration.

Therefore, when the honourable senator finishes giving the report it will be laid on the Table, and that is it, unless honourable senators wish to make a motion to debate it at a later time.

Senator Asselin: Yes, but Senator Barrow has not tabled it, and he is making a speech on the report itself.

Senator Frith: He is making the report, senator.

Senator Asselin: He should have tabled the report first, because this report is not a debatable matter.

Senator Frith: It is a debatable matter under rule 78(2), if, after he has made the report, it is laid on the Table. The time to decide whether we want to debate the report is the time at which it is laid on the Table—that is, after the report has been made.

Senator Asselin: Is it not the custom of this house, however, that the report first be tabled, then read, after which a question is put as to the consideration of it?

Senator Frith: That is not the case under rule 78(2). Sometimes such reports are simply presented without debate. Under rule 78(3) or 78(4), of course, Senator Asselin is quite right. Under normal procedures, when a committee reports a bill without amendment, the report stands adopted without debate.

Rule 78(2) says that reports shall be received without debate. However, an exception is made in rule 78(3) for a report which is for the information only of the Senate.

Senator Asselin: It says "shall."

Senator Frith: Yes, "shall be received without debate," but it further states that reports that are for the information only of the senators shall be laid on the Table, and may be debated, on motion. Otherwise, rule 78(1) would take effect, and the report would simply be accepted without debate.

• (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): In my view, Senator Asselin's point deserves a little more consideration. The report is an oral one. If we refer to rule 78(3), it says:

A report which by its own terms is for the information only of the Senate shall be laid on the Table—

That is not happening. The report is being read. I suggest there is a big difference between a written report that is laid on the Table and an oral report. So, in that sense, Senator Asselin has a concern. I myself am not disturbed so much by the fact that it is an oral report, which has been done before, as I am by the fact that it covers a subject which is highly difficult to comprehend; and the idea that many members of this house will be able to understand the meaning of the convoluted detail of this report by hearing it read on the first occasion is, I believe, a little optimistic. So far as I am concerned, if my honourable friend, the chairman of the committee, wishes to take it as read, and it is then printed and appears on our order paper at a later date, we will have an opportunity to consider the content of what he is saying. As for the present procedure, I am of the opinion that it is probably an exercise in futility.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suggest that the report that is being made is quite in order. It will appear in Debates of the Senate because it is being read. I can recall Senator Hayden following a similar course on a previous occasion in connection with pre-study of a subject matter by the same committee. That is the precedent that is being followed.

The suggestions made by Senator Asselin and Senator Roblin are provided for in the rules. The report is being read and no doubt the notes will be tabled. A motion can be made to debate it, if it is considered desirable to do so, and in due course it will appear in Debates of the Senate because it is being read. I suggest that we allow the reading of the report to be completed. We know, from information before us, that the subject matter pertains to the bill, which we expect to receive later this afternoon. If we proceed to deal with it, as we shall do on some occasion between now and the end of the month, the report of the pre-study will be in print. The bill will then be referred back to committee, and the report, which will appear in Debates of the Senate, will help us determine how much further committee study is required.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps it is worthwhile adding a further comment to what has already been said. The matter of this report was considered in committee. I was present; so I have a certain responsibility for the fact that an oral report is being offered. However, the committee took that course because of the inexorable pressure of time, about which more will be heard today with respect to matters of this kind. We were asked to agree to having an oral report because there was insufficient time to get it properly printed and translated. That is why it is oral and not printed. I believe the same situation applied in the case of Senator Hayden, to which reference was made. It brings up the question that perhaps those of us who are on such committees in future should take account of this problem, because if it is going to cause us some difficulty—as it is doing in this instance—perhaps we would be better advised to follow the regular procedure and have reports properly printed and translated, and thus relieve the chairman of the committee of finding himself in the invidious position in which he unwittingly finds himself today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I support the honourable senator in his suggestion, namely, that in view of our experience on this occasion and on past occasions, we should consider whether we wish to continue this tradition, although admittedly the tradition would be followed only in exceptional circumstances. In the meantime, I suggest that we complete this report and then give consideration to whether we shall accept oral reports in future, for the reasons given by Senator Roblin.

Senator Asselin: Do you have a French version of the oral report?

Senator Frith: Because the report is being given orally, the translation will also be given orally.

Senator Barrow: Senator Roblin is quite correct. The reason we are giving an oral report is that we did not have time to translate the report into the other official language.

Senator Asselin: You should have taken the time to do so.

Senator Barrow: It was not possible.

Indexed Security Investment Plans: The bill introduces the Indexed Security Investment Plan, the objective of which is to exempt from tax the inflationary portion of capital gains on many publicly-traded securities of Canadian corporations. Individuals and most trusts will be able to invest in qualified securities through an ISIP effective October 1, 1983. An ISIP is a written contract between an eligible investor and an administrator of the plan. The cost of investments in the plan is indexed, based on changes in the consumer price index. An investor can either purchase new eligible securities or transfer existing securities he holds into the ISIP. The transfer of securities into an ISIP will be treated as a transaction occurring at fair market value and may trigger a capital gain or loss. The amount of a deemed capital loss that may be realized on the transfer of securities to an ISIP in a year is limited to the amount of capital gains realized on such transfers in the year. However, capital losses realized in the transfer of securities on or before December 31, 1984 may give rise to unlimited capital losses.

Gains and losses attributable to investments in an ISIP will be computed based on the indexed cost and 25 per cent of the real capital gains or losses will be recognized annually by the investor as a capital gain or loss for income tax purposes whether or not the investments are disposed of.

Registered Home Ownership Savings Plans: Two measures are proposed. First, eligible individuals acquiring a newly-constructed home after April 19, 1983 and before December 31, 1984 will be able to claim an additional deduction in computing their income equal to $10,000 minus the total of all tax deductible RHOSP contributions previously made by them.

Second, in order to provide further stimulus to the economy, individuals will be permitted to withdraw all or part of their accumulated savings in RHOSPs free of tax for the purchase of new home furnishings and appliances in 1983, even though they do not purchase a new home.

Individuals: Several measures are contained in the bill affecting individuals, the general thrust of which is to assist taxpayers in lower income brackets. First, the employment expense deduction will be increased from 3 per cent of employment income with a maximum of $500 to 20 per cent of employment income with a maximum of $500. Second, with respect to child care expenses, the maximum deduction available will be increased from $4,000 to $8,000 and the limit per child from $1,000 to $2,000. There will be no more indexation for dependents under 18 years of age.

The child tax credit was temporarily raised by the June 28, 1982 budget from $293 to $343. The credit will remain at $343 for 1983 and will be fully indexed for subsequent years. The income threshold will remain at its 1982 level of $26,330 for 1983 and following years.

The optional $100 deduction, instead of deducting charitable donations and medical expenses, will be repealed.

The federal tax credit will be reduced from $200 to $100 for 1985 and $50 for subsequent years. It will also be reduced starting in 1984 by 10 per cent of the amount by which an individual's tax otherwise payable exceeds $6,000.

Overseas Employment Tax Credit: Individuals resident in Canada but employed abroad for more than six consecutive months are entitled to a deduction from income equal to the lesser of $50,000 and 50 per cent of income earned outside Canada. The bill proposes that they be entitled to a deduction from tax equal to 80 per cent of the tax otherwise payable up to $100,000 of income earned outside Canada.

Aviation Turbine Fuel: Bill C-139, which received first reading on December 7, 1982, introduced measures requiring fuel suppliers to include in their income for tax purposes a deemed amount in respect of aviation fuel sold for international transportation. In its report to the Senate dated March 16, 1983, your committee expressed grave concerns with respect to this proposal. Your committee is pleased to report that this measure has been repealed.

The committee has reviewed the matters set forth in the Order of Reference in accordance with its terms of reference and has no comment to make at this time.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE HONOURABLE HAZEN ARGUE, P.C.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS TO SASKATCHEWAN LIBERALS—REQUEST FOR LIST OF RECIPIENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to Senator Argue, but not in his capacity of Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Recently, I happened to see some Christmas greetings he sent to several people in his province, on Senate stationery. They were addressed to "Dear Fellow Liberal". I would like to know whether there were many of these greetings and whether Senator Argue could produce a list of his Liberal friends and indicate where they are from.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I realize it is quite a restricted list. Not being a person who sends out greetings in the same quantities as others it is probably a fairly restricted list.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that asked by Senator Asselin. Did you have to pay extra postage on it?

Senator Argue: I think I would have paid the same postage as Conservative members of this place and other places pay when they send greetings to other Conservatives, of which there is still a large number in this country.

JUSTICE

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to questions addressed to me by Senator Roblin on December 19 with respect to items under the responsibility of the Minister of Justice relating to proceedings in respect of certain uranium companies and a decision of December 15 last by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Roblin put certain questions to me, which I will try to answer seriatim. The first question he put was with respect to whether or not the government intends to proceed with the case against the other four companies involved in this matter. I am quoting from page 45 of Debates of the Senate for Monday, December 19, 1983, where Senator Roblin said:

—it seems to me invidious that the government is contemplating proceedings against four companies but is excluding two companies simply because they are crown corporations.

Here is his question:

So I ask my honourable friend whether he will undertake to suggest to his colleague, the Minister of Justice, that the government waive crown immunity in respect of these two companies, thereby allowing the matter to be dealt with without discrimination between private companies and public companies.

I must say that I did not understand whether Senator Roblin was taking a position to the effect that we should no longer prosecute the private companies because it was invidious and unfair to discontinue against two crown corporations and still continue against the private corporations. In any event, the Minister of Justice has taken the decision, on the advice of the special prosecutors, to discontinue the proceedings against the private uranium companies in the belief that to proceed against them would be unfair and inequitable in the circumstances.

The Minister of Justice advises me as well that there is no question of discretion with respect to whether or not the two crown corporations could plead crown immunity. The Supreme Court of Canada has found that the doctrine of crown immunity applies to them by statute, and therefore, there is no legal basis on which crown immunity can be waived.

I would like to quote a portion of the decision of the majority, which was a five-to-two decision by the Supreme Court of Canada:

The maxim that the Queen can do no wrong is a legal fiction which, at common law, serves the purpose of preventing the Queen from being impleaded in her own courts. There is, however, no comparable maxim that an agent of the Queen can do no wrong.

The conclusion that a Crown agent is personally responsible for an unlawful act still leaves the question whether the act is unlawful. Where the unlawfulness or the wrongfulness of the act arises without any recourse to a statute, the Crown's immunity from statute, as expressed in s. 16 of the Interpretation Act, is irrelevant. If, for example, the agent commits a tortious act, it is the common law which characterizes it as unlawful. There is no immunity that the agent can claim.

Where the only source of the unlawfulness is a statute, however, the analysis is entirely different. Reference to a statute is necessary for criminal responsibility in Canada, apart from contempt of court, because s. 8 of the Criminal Code precludes any conviction for an offence at common law. If a person commits an act prohibited by statute, and the Attorney General seeks to prosecute for violation of that statute, the preliminary question that must be asked is whether that person is bound by the statute. If not, the person simply does not commit a violation of the statute. The situation is not that the person is immune from prosecution even though there has been an unlawful act; rather, that there has been no unlawful act under the statute. I have already said that the Combines Investigation Act does not bind the Crown. If Uranium Canada and Eldorado share the Crown's immunity, they can have committed no offence under the Act.

I believe I have answered Senator Roblin's question on whether a waiver of crown immunity is possible and also his inquiry regarding the discretion of the minister with respect thereto.

With respect to Senator Roblin's comments as to whether or not I, in my capacity as a minister of the Crown, would participate in any discretionary matter relating to these proceedings, I would like to make it clear that I have not so participated; and, as I have said, there is no discretion with respect to the waiver of crown immunity, so I have not participated in that respect.

Senator Roblin also asked whether the government had any intention of reconsidering the issue of crown immunity. I would like to advise that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable Judy Erola, has said in the other place and elsewhere that it was her intention to deal with the crown immunity issue in the context of legislation to be introduced in the present session. She has also said that there would be no retroactive application of any changes that are to be proposed.

Senator Roblin also asked me to advise how many other crown corporations there are which enjoy the position of crown immunity. The best answer I can give to that is that any crown corporation, acting under similar provisions of the law and within the authority of its statute and regulations thereunder and the authority of Orders in Council, will have the same benefits until the legislation is changed. I cannot list the corporations because facts change the application of the doctrine of immunity.

With respect to Senator Roblin's final question, following his observation that one of the honourable judges seemed to believe that this gave carte blanche to crown corporations to do what they wished, Senator Roblin also said, "The fact is that these two corporations have done something which is certainly questionable."

I should like it noted that in the decision handed down on December 15, the court makes it very clear that there were no facts before it to indicate that there were any questions raised by their conduct at all. I think it would be fair to those corporations for me to be very clear in saying that there has been no statement in any way, shape or form put before any judicial proceeding as to any impropriety on their part.

Finally, honourable senators, I should like to say how disappointed I am, having been Deputy Minister of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, that these proceedings, once initiated, were discontinued by the processes I have just outlined. Frankly, I believe that the actions taken by those two crown corporations, by myself and by other officials, along with companies in the private sector, to defend Canada's uranium mining industry were fully lawful and would have been shown to be such by the conclusion of such proceedings.

I believe they were valuable to the people of Canada; I believe they were valuable to the mining communities of Elliot Lake, Ontario and Uranium City and Beaver Lodge, Saskatchewan and that they protected those communities from, and prevented them from collapsing under, the predatory kinds of selling practices undertaken by other uranium producers. However, we will not have the opportunity of my being demonstrated to be correct by a judicial conclusion.

My greatest regret is that this matter will continue to be debated by those who do not understand Canada's commercial trade interests, by those who do not understand the lawful steps that are available to Canada in order to deal with quite predatory foreign trade behaviour, and by those who buy holus-bolus the arguments of American commercial interests.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I suppose honourable senators will not object to my making some comments on the self-serving report we have just received from the minister.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Are you asking for leave?

Senator Roblin: If you do not wish me to speak, I will resume my seat.

Senator Frith: On the contrary, I want you to ask for leave so that I can grant it.

Senator Roblin: If anyone feels I should not be heard, I will resume my seat.

With respect to the regret the minister expressed in his peroration, if that is the correct word, about the matter not being ventilated in the courts, then that expression is shared widely. I should like him to know quite clearly that I did not make any charges. I should also like him to know quite clearly that I do not think there is any mysterious band of people in the United States or elsewhere who want to make charges against the government in respect of this matter. The charges were made by the government itself; the charges were made by the advisers to the Minister of Justice. That is where all of the information came from, so far as I am concerned. That seems to be the basis of the matter, and I think it is a little strange that the minister should not recognize that as a fact.

Whether those men who advised the government were right or wrong is a matter which is, no doubt, debatable, but the fact is that they did recommend that not only the four private corporations give an account of their dealings before the courts, but that the two public corporations do the same. So this is not some conspiracy or some oversight; this is a proposal that was put by the legal advisers to the Crown. They may have been completely wrong. The Supreme Court says that they were wrong in respect of the charges against the public corporations—not that they have not committed some act that other people might think incorrect, but merely that the law does not regard it as incorrect.

There are some occasions, although not very often, Senator Walker, when I wish that I were a lawyer like you and understood the complexities of the law. I have to accept the statements—and I accept them willingly—that the minister has made with respect to the legal situation. All I know is that, in referring to this question of crown immunity, one of the justices of the Supreme Court said—and these are her words, not mine—that she "has serious doubts that Parliament ever intended (the federal companies) . . . to have a carte blanche to engage in illegal activities on behalf of the Crown". That is her statement and not mine.

Senator Frith: She dissented.

Senator Roblin: Yes, she did, but she is entitled to her opinion as I am entitled to mine.

Senator Frith: Quite so.

Senator Roblin: That is not the majority opinion. The point that I want to make, cutting through all the palaver here, is what is the critical public issue that has to be addressed? It is to establish confidence that our system is framed in the right order and to establish confidence that people in public organizations who do things which are deemed to be questionable are subject to the same penalty and the same examination as others in the community. Therefore, I ask the minister very specifically to tell me whether the government intends to deal with this matter. His answer to me is unclear. He says it will be considered in the context of another bill, but exactly what that means we will not know until we see the bill. That is the point that is at issue here. The fact that the government now finds itself, for one reason or another, inclined to say it was a great mistake from the beginning—in other words, that we should not have charged the two crown corporations and, since we cannot charge them, we are not going to go ahead with charges against the four private corporations—is, I think, an example of the confusion that has developed because of the poor policy posture in which the government, and thus the country, finds itself on the question of crown immunity.

I think the minister would be well advised to examine the genesis of this problem, which was not of my making but rather arose from the activities of the government through its crown advisers. He would be well advised to examine the question of immunity, which he referred to but certainly not in any definitive terms, so that we do not run into this kind of situation again. With respect to being invidious, I think it is invidious not to include the two crown corporations in the defence operation. I am rather surprised that the minister, being so keen to have a defence of his action before the courts—and I think he is right to do so—has not exercised more influence in securing some means by which this could be brought about. Not being a lawyer, I am not at all convinced that it is impossible for the Crown to waive immunity. I do not think it is impossible. They may not have to do it. The law may exclude them from the onus of this charge, but I am not at all convinced that they could not say, "We will give up the crown immunity that the Supreme Court has conferred upon us and appear before the court and give an account just as we expect the other four companies to do." If they have committed no wrong—and the minister maintains that position—there is nothing to fear. In fact, it would be helpful because it would clear the air, and that should be done. With regard to the uranium industry, in principle you want to support them, but you do not want to do so in contravention of the laws of the country. Somebody in the legal department thought that the law had been contravened, and we are still left hanging in mid-air with respect to that important issue.

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, with the same leave that Senator Roblin obtained, I should also like to provide some observations. This is a bitter-sweet situation for me. As I have said before, I would much prefer that the public record demonstrate clearly what was done in the circumstances of the government's response to the uranium crisis in the early 1970s. That these judicial proceedings will deny that possibility is also now clear. Whatever Senator Roblin believes about the law, the Supreme Court of Canada has now found that crown immunity applies by statute to Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. and Uranium Canada Ltd., and the law officers of the Crown have advised that the Crown cannot waive a statutory provision because it has no discretion to do so.

I said that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs intends to introduce statutory provisions which would change this circumstance.

This matter had its origins in a commercial dispute between a United States entity, Westinghouse, and certain Canadian uranium producers. The embargo by the United States on Canadian uranium production in 1959 followed a period when the United States encouraged Canadian resource development for its market. Then, suddenly, it delivered this guillotine blow to the Canadian uranium industry.

The matter of the Canadian government's response in the early seventies was raised by Conservative members of the House of Commons and became something of a public debate. Those members were not content with the answers given by ministers of the Crown of the day with respect to the allegations. The Director of the Combines Investigations Branch launched an inquiry. A special investigator was retained. That investigator suggested that the issue should be proceeded with in the manner that is on the record.

We come back to the beginning point of the circle. No facts have been alleged in these proceedings to show any matter of a criminal kind or any matter which constitutes a breach of the Combines Investigation Act because, prior to hearing evidence on the merits of this matter, the Supreme Court of Canada was asked to make a ruling. There I end by saying I regret the merits were not heard, but that seems to end the matter.

Senator Roblin: I have one comment to make, and that is that the minister says that no facts of impropriety were introduced. What on earth, then, was the charge contemplated, and why was it contemplated?

Senator Austin: A charge is not facts; a charge is a charge. Facts are quite different from a charge.

Senator Roblin: No one makes a charge without some facts, so there must have been some reason for the charge.

Senator Austin: That is implying that any time someone wishes to lay a charge the onus is on the defendant to show he is not guilty of the charge. Under our law, guilt cannot be found until evidence is introduced and a court of competent jurisdiction has rendered a judgment.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend persists in omitting the fact that law officers of the Crown—in fact, the Minister of Justice—concluded that there was a basis for a charge. One has to assume there was something to it.

Senator Austin: Under the Combines Investigation Act, the director concluded that there was a prima facie case to present, but that case was never presented before a court. There is no evidence before a court to show any derogation of any kind by any of these companies, private or public.

What exists is a charge issued by that director, which is, if you like, an opinion of a person, but it is not the opinion of others. It is certainly not the opinion of a court.

Senator Roblin: A prima facie case to me means that there is some substance which needs to be elucidated and examined. I regret, along with the minister, that it appears that that examination will never take place.

Hon. C. William Doody: Would the minister consider appointing a royal commission or an inquiry of some sort to clear the air on the circumstances? My colleague has suggested that there must have been some facts involved or the charge would not have been laid. I am sure everyone would like to have the record clear on the matter.

Senator Austin: The Minister of Justice has said that he considers the matter closed because it would be an act of unfairness to proceed against private companies. As for an inquiry, in general, that is not within my ministerial responsibility.

STANDING COMMITTEES

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEES TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, December 20, 1983, moved:

That for the duration of the present session and pursuant to rule 76(3), any select committee may meet during an adjournment of the Senate which exceeds a week.

He said: Honourable senators, rule 76(1) provides that a select committee may adjourn from time to time and, by order of the Senate, from place to place. However, rule 76(3) provides that, by order of the Senate, any select committee may meet during an adjournment of the Senate which exceeds a week.

Our committees have become even more active over the last few months; if this motion is agreed to, it will enable committees to sit without special order during any adjournment of the Senate exceeding one week. This is proposed as an experiment for the remainder of this session.

This motion is brought forward as the result of requests from committee chairmen, who may wish committees to meet during an adjournment without special order. For example, if we adjourn and a committee wishes to sit, it is impossible for it to do so unless it has permission to do so by order of the Senate before the adjournment. Adoption of this motion will give more flexibility to committee chairmen and committee members to call meetings during adjournments of the Senate which exceed one week.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think we have any objection to the substance of this motion, but I would make one request, and that is, if any committee chairman decides to take advantage of this opportunity, that he give adequate notice. Some senators, when they are in their homes, are a long way away and it sometimes takes the better part of two days to get here. It is not helpful if only 24 or 48 hours' notice is given.

I would hope that the leadership on the other side could bring to the attention of committee chairmen that, if they want to hold these meetings, they should give adequate notice.

Senator Frith: Yes. In fact, during this experimental period I think it should be understood that this is an extraordinary power and, if possible, committee chairmen should consult with their members before taking advantage of it; they should try to give enough notice and suit members' convenience.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, as the co-ordinator of committees in the previous session of Parliament, I am fully in agreement with the representations of both Senators Roblin and Frith. However, in view of the notice of motion which I gave yesterday, I think it would be useful if the motion were to extend to both select and special committees of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think it does apply to both standing and special committees.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to re-assemble at the call of the bell at approximately 4.45 this afternoon. My reason for asking that we so adjourn is that, as I mentioned earlier this week, Bill C-2 is subject to a house order that takes effect today which will result in the bill's being debated at third reading as of 3 o'clock today. The order also provides for three speeches of a maximum of 20 minutes for each party. By order of the other place, the bill will then be ready to be voted on at 4 o'clock. It will be a 15-minute bell. Therefore, if all goes according to plan in the other place, the bill will be given third reading in time for us to receive it at 4.45, the time specified in my motion for the resumption of our sitting at the call of the bell.

• (1450)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Would my honourable friend be disposed to tell honourable senators what he intends to do when the sitting is resumed at 4.45?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators. As I believe I mentioned on another occasion, it is the government's wish that this bill be given Royal Assent by the end of this year. I previously mentioned a number of plans that would be available to us in order that it be so passed.

When the bill appears here for first reading, it is my intention to ask for leave to proceed to second reading forthwith and to proceed with debate on second reading, in the hope that the bill can be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I would then ask honourable senators to adjourn again during pleasure to await the report of the committee. When we receive that report, I hope to proceed to the debate on third reading, giving as much time as possible for that debate. I would hope that we can complete it some time later tonight.

All of that, of course, requires leave. If leave is not granted, then I propose to adjourn the Senate. I would then ask for leave to proceed on Thursday. If leave were not granted, we would then have to proceed with the bill on Friday, continuing on into the following week until honourable senators felt ready to conclude the debate and vote on third reading.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps it is only fair for me to say to my honourable friend that he should not take for granted the question of the granting of leave. I and my colleagues are quite willing, I am sure, to have him explain to us, either now or on a later occasion, why he thinks that leave should be granted. We will not make any observation on this situation until we have heard from him. I would not think it advisable, however, to take it for granted.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, recently I have been quite conditioned to the idea of not taking leave for granted. I do not take it for granted in this case. I will add to what I said on Monday night about why the government wants the bill passed by the end of the year and why, therefore, I believe that the Senate should begin debate on the bill—and finish that debate—as soon as we can. It may be that we will take hours to do so; it may be that we will take days or even longer.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Perhaps it's about time we had a good fight in the Senate.

Senator Frith: I'm ready when you are.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.50 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Bill C-2 is presently being debated in the House order in the other place, pursuant to the order to which I referred earlier this afternoon when I asked that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to return at approximately 4.45 p.m.

Honourable senators will recall that the time of 4.45 p.m. was chosen by computing an hour of debate, as provided in the House order in the other place, plus a 15-minute bell and 15 minutes in which to conduct the vote. We therefore estimated approximately one hour and a half. Debate on the bill in the other place would have been completed by 4.30 and we would have received the bill at approximately 4.45 p.m. However, because of other proceedings, the other house did not reach Orders of the Day until approximately 4.20 p.m. If we apply the same timing, we would not receive the bill until about 5.50 p.m.

Therefore, I propose that we adjourn to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 7.30 p.m. At that time we should receive the bill, together with a note concerning any amendments. We shall also have the temporary parchment ready in order to proceed with the bill. At that time I will attempt to persuade honourable senators to grant leave to proceed with second reading.

Senator Roblin commented earlier that I would have to be very eloquent to persuade honourable senators to grant leave. I can only tell the honourable senator that I will do my best. Therefore, I propose that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 7.30 p.m.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it may not signify much, but I can say that the third speaker in the other place has spoken for about 10 minutes and, therefore, has approximately 10 more minutes. Perhaps the Acting Leader of the Government can take that into account. I believe that we on this side of the house are agreeable to resuming at approximately 7.30 p.m., if it suits the convenience of the government.

Perhaps I should close that little loophole I left in connection with granting leave, because I am sure that certain senators would like to know definitely, particularly the honourable senator who introduces the bill. Therefore, I should make it clear to my honourable friend that we shall probably not be disposed to give leave.

At 7.40 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-2, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I move the motion for second reading of Bill C-2, I would like to bring up to date those who do not know what transpired in the House of Commons, because it changes what I said earlier this afternoon.

Honourable senators will remember that I had said that I expected the bill would receive third reading in the other place, in accordance with their order, and that they would then suspend the sitting and be available for Royal Assent in the event the Senate passed the bill through all its stages. However, before proceeding to Orders of the Day in the other place, the opposition house leader, the Honourable Erik Nielsen, made a statement, while raising a point of order, to the effect that in spite of the opposition's view that the government ought to resign, for the sake of giving the bill passage and for the sake of the taxpayers the opposition would observe the house order and proceed to the vote on third reading of the bill. The house leaders then held a meeting and agreed that, since they were going to pass the bill by 6 o'clock, they would not suspend the sitting but would adjourn for the Christmas recess. Having decided to adjourn, they are, of course, no longer available for Royal Assent, which changes the position of the government as I stated it this afternoon. I learned in consultation that the other place hopes to have Royal Assent as soon as it comes back from its Christmas recess.

Under those circumstances, I propose that leave be given to deal with second reading this evening, since we are here and since the taxpayers have paid for us to get here and will pay for us to get home. So rather than come back between now and January 16 to give the bill second reading, or come back on January 16 and begin second reading, I ask that we give the bill second reading tonight. I undertake to propose that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce after second reading, and then to move that we adjourn until January 16.

We are convened here. I advised honourable senators on Monday that we would want to proceed with the second reading stage at least. In fact, at that time I was proposing more. It is not as if anyone is being taken by surprise. In effect, the de facto situation is that the request tonight for second reading has received more than two days' notice, therefore, it seems reasonable to proceed to the second reading stage while we are here tonight. We can refer the matter to committee, and then return on January 16 to proceed through the ensuing stages of the bill.

Therefore, I move, with leave, that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. The Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think I should speak to the question of leave. I do not know which aphorism to start with—perhaps "One man's meat is another man's poison, or, "What a difference a day makes." I think I should probably start with the second—"What a difference a day makes," since with respect to this question of how we should handle the bill we were told when we assembled in this chamber on Monday that the sky would fall. We were told that the government would be very annoyed at the very least if the Senate did not abandon all its rules of procedure and give itself up to the proposition that the bill should be disposed of as quickly as possible—in fact, the scenario was within a matter of hours.

I certainly made it clear that I would require a great deal of convincing to yield to the proposition that leave should be given to allow this course of events to take place. We now find at the last moment that all this bluster and bluff about the necessity of this bill's being passed today is nothing but that. It was not required for today. Suddenly the bill that had to be passed before the end of this year is now said to be quite safe if left in our hands until January 16 at the latest. I think that casts a certain shadow, or imparts a certain colour, on the whole of the discussion, and to the proposition made by the Acting Leader of the Government that we should give leave for second reading tonight. We have made it clear that we were not impressed with that proposition, and that leave would not be granted.

I think I owe it to this chamber to give some reasons as to why we thought that this was the right course to follow and why we, as an opposition, had a duty to take what in the eyes of some people may appear to be an obdurate or stubborn position. The fact is that this bill now before us is not a simple bill; it is a document of some 210 pages. It contains some of the most convoluted and dense legal phraseology that anyone would wish to see. I predict it will keep lawyers and chartered accountants in fee for many a long year to come. It is a bill which contains at least 18 tax changes of one kind or another. It is a bill which affects millions of dollars in government revenue, and in terms of our taxpayers it affects hundreds of thousands.

The proposition which was offered to us—that is, that we should dispose of this piece of legislation hugger-mugger, as quickly as we possibly could, in order to meet a deadline which has proved to be artificial and false—is a position which I, for one, would not care to defend. I think it is not defensible.

This is a bill which should be treated with the proper attention the Senate usually gives to legislation. Nobody is saying now that if the bill is not passed by January 16 the public will suffer. No one is saying that any more, although it was suggested by some at various stages of the proceedings. In fact, we know perfectly well that parts of this bill are already in operation. We know that the government has sanctioned that activity because the government itself has said that ISIPs had to be entered into by this day of grace—that is, December 21, 1983—in order to have effect in the year 1983 even though the bill has not passed. The proposition that the opposition would be doing some harm to the citizens of Canada if it did not yield to the suggestion first made, that this bill be rushed through with all possible speed, falls to the ground. It just has no logical or reasonable basis whatsoever. I find that to be a comfort, because, when an opposition takes the stand that it will use the rules to protect what it believes is in the public interest, it has at least to satisfy itself that it has a sound reason for doing so, that it is not just being stubborn.

I take some comfort in finding that our view that this bill was not required on December 21, but could be dealt with later—say on January 16—is now a proposition accepted by everybody. I confess to a certain sympathy with the Leader of the Opposition having to deal with this series of requests that obviously have been made to him about the progress of this bill in the house. I think that he must share with me some satisfaction—

Hon. Martial Asselin: You mean the Leader of the Government.

Senator Roblin: What did I say?

Senator Asselin: You said the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry about that. Occasionally, the wrong name slips out. After all, I managed to get Jean Lesage into the debate the other day. The poor Leader of the Opposition is at home in bed in Quebec City and I have him down here. I apologize for that. I meant my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government. I have a lot of sympathy for him because I think he has been placed in a very difficult position.

I think perhaps some of the senators on the other side of the house are also pretty happy that they are not being asked to support the proposition that we should deal with this debate in the manner that was first suggested to us.

In dealing with the question of public interest with respect to the importance of the bill, I think the opposition is justified in saying that it intends to use the rules. There are not many rules in the Senate, but the Rules of the Senate are the only protection that the opposition has from a government majority, and, at times, it is justified in using them for that purpose. I think this is one of those times.

However, it is not only the public interest in this bill that concerns me; it is respect for the good name of the Senate. This institution has been under some criticism in days gone by. I can vouch for the fact that the reputation of the Senate has not been at that level of public approval and approbation some of us would wish to see. The very fact that, today, there has been leaked a report about our future—which, if true, is calling for an elected Senate—certainly has to be a grave reflection upon the nature of our business and the way we conduct it at the present time. To add fuel to that flame by saying, “Furthermore, when we get a tax bill of 210 pages, we are going to pass it in one fell swoop,” would have caused the bonfire to blaze. Therefore, when one considers not only the public interest but the reputation and the image of the Senate of Canada, I think the opposition is justified in saying that it will apply the rules of this chamber in dealing with this matter, because that is the way it must proceed with respect to the public interest of the country.

All one had to do was listen this afternoon to the report of the senator who chaired the committee that dealt with this matter. He read into the record the highlights of a very difficult bill. I wonder how many members of this chamber would have had the foggiest idea what he was talking about, unless they had been in the committee. I would also remind honourable senators that the report is not yet in writing; we have not had a chance to see that report, and yet the government wishes to have second reading tonight. The very point of having the committee do a pre-examination of the bill was to give us information so that we could deal more effectively with the legislation before us. It is not in print; it is not in French; it is not even in English; it is not before us. It is a verbal report, and I admit my responsibility in agreeing that it should be. Looking back, I see my mistake and I doubt that I will do the same thing again. However, that is the situation in which we find ourselves at the present time.

The Senate is supposed to be the repository of sober second thought, and yet tonight we are being asked to proceed in a manner that is not provided for in our rules and that will obviously not allow us to give the bill the attention it should receive.

I would like to make something else clear to my colleagues in this house. We have no intention of being obstructionists with regard to this particular piece of legislation. We have recognized the wish of the government that this bill receive Royal Assent on January 16, and, as far as we are concerned, we are willing to do our part to see that the bill is debated with all deliberate speed so that Royal Assent can take place on or around the date mentioned. So, we are not interested in obstructing this measure; we are not interested in holding up the government with respect to this piece of legislation; we really want to see the Senate conduct its activities in the manner in which it should.

I think it would have been a humiliation had we been asked to deal with the bill as originally suggested, and I am very pleased that that is not now the case.

I do think that there is a case now for following our own rules and for using our own common sense. There are certain time limits set out in the Rules of the Senate which we should pay some attention to, and if we follow the dictates of common sense, we will realize that there is plenty of time for us to deal with the bill. The question of Royal Assent has been removed until January 16. I am prepared to see that the bill is in such shape that it can receive Royal Assent on that date. If we proceed in that way, we can do our duty and, at the same time, not impede the legislative responsibility of my friend opposite in any way that could be seriously faulted.

Honourable senators may have gathered from what I have said that we are not prepared to give leave, but we are prepared to deal with the bill in accordance with our rules.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before the question of leave is put—apparently it will be refused—let me just clarify a couple of points that I think were not accurately stated by Senator Roblin.

I did not say this bill ought to be passed this evening. I said that the government wished to have this bill passed by the end of the year. I said that we should not attempt to pass the bill this evening, but be prepared to sit for as long as necessary in order to have it passed by December 31. That would give the Senate a great deal more time to deal with this than just simply this evening.

What Senator Roblin has said is relevant to the question of insisting on three readings this evening. I want it to be clear that all I was saying before tonight was that we should take a run at that; however, circumstances have changed.

Secondly, I am not now asking leave to have this legislation receive first, second and third reading this evening. I simply said that we have known about the bill for some time—at least we have been talking about it since Monday—and that we should proceed to second reading this evening. All we will be debating is the principle of the bill—

Senator Asselin: Where is the report of the committee?

Senator Frith: We do not have one. The report we have received is a report on the pre-study which took place.

Senator Asselin: The report of that committee was not in both official languages.

Senator Frith: If we proceed to second reading this evening, all we will have accomplished is a referral to the committee.

Senator Asselin: I want to see the report first.

Senator Frith: That is not the report on the bill. Even if that report did not exist, I would still be asking that the bill receive second reading this evening and be referred to the committee. The report of the committee on a pre-study is not intended to assist us in understanding the principle of the bill; it is intended to assist us in understanding the details of the bill, and that is precisely why, after second reading and debate on the principle of the bill, we refer bills to a committee.

I think the principle of this bill has been before us for at least three days. I am only asking for leave to proceed to second reading this evening. As I said, we are here this evening, and I think we should proceed to second reading. That is what I am requesting. We have prepared ourselves for that. We knew we were going to at least attempt to do that this evening, at least. I think it is unreasonable not to grant that request. I consider that to be totally unreasonable. One could not say it is totally unreasonable not to give consent for three readings this evening, or to refuse to participate in three readings this evening, but, in the circumstances, and bearing in mind the length of time we have known the principle of the bill, to simply say, "No, we will not give leave to proceed to second reading, though we have prepared ourselves for it," is unreasonable. That is my view, but apparently it is not shared by the opposition.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate in order to clarify what Senator Roblin stated. When he said there was no way by which we can have Royal Assent given to Bill C-2 before the end of the year, did he mean he was prepared to have the bill passed and assented to by January 16—in other words, on that day there will be consent for second reading, third reading and Royal Assent? Did I understand that correctly?

Senator Frith: If I understood Senator Roblin correctly, he said that he would facilitate that, but that there could not be Royal Assent before January 16, which means that we could come back and have second reading on January 4, January 5 or January 9. What I am saying is: Why should we come back on January 9 when we can do it this evening?

Senator Roblin: We cannot do it this evening.

Senator Frith: We can if we get leave.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, it is certainly not my intention to fuel the flames. I don't think I want to stir up a discussion that would probably be useless. With Senator Roblin, I fully sympathize with the position in which my honourable friend the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate finds himself this evening.

It is not his fault. It is not the fault of the Opposition either, but we are faced with a fait accompli, where the other place is thumbing its nose at the Senate. When I say the other place, I am not only referring to the Government Members, I include the Members of the Official Opposition. They use the Senate as it suits them. When they can undermine the Senate, they are not particular about their methods. It is hardly surprising that today, people are saying the Senate should be abolished or should be elected or should disappear altogether. If we were to act on the recommendations of the Acting Leader of the Senate this evening, it would, once again, be an affront to the dignity of this Chamber.

I said—I am not going to reveal any caucus secrets—but this morning, I protested against a request by some Members of our Party who wanted us to proceed with all three stages of Bill this evening.

Senator Frith: We are trying.

Senator Asselin: No, I'm not talking about you, but about members of my Party who wanted us to adopt all three stages this evening. I told them: You are not going to force us to consider legislation, as the Acting Leader of my Party said earlier, that is over 200 pages long, contains substantial legal technicalities and requires careful study—

Senator Frith: This evening we only want to consider the principle.

Senator Asselin: I don't know whether I will be in favour of the principle of the Bill.

Senator Frith: The principle is considered at the second reading stage.

Senator Asselin: I have not seen the Bill. I can inform my honourable friend that I cannot vote on the principle because I haven't seen the Bill and I haven't seen the Committee's report.

The Chairman of the committee did not even give Francophones like myself—and this has not happened often in the Senate during the last ten years—a chance to examine the committee's report in French.

I do not have the report before me and my honourable friend tells me that it is only the report of a preliminary study.

Senator Frith: That is normal.

Senator Asselin: Please, do not interrupt me. You will have plenty of time afterwards. You will be free to speak as long as you want.

Senator Frith: We can have second reading of a bill without any report.

Senator Asselin: I am saying to my honourable friend that, when he urged us to send the bill to committee for a preliminary study, it was precisely to have before us the report of the committee which would give us an indication of the position to be taken at least on the principle of the bill. I do not have that report before me.

Besides, as a French-speaking senator, I am insulted because the report is in English and no French translation is available. When will I have it? In two or three days maybe?

Senator Frith: The committee report is before third reading.

Senator Asselin: I want to read the report; it is my privilege to read the report of the preliminary study of the committee, because I want to know who were the witnesses who appeared before the committee and on what principle they can justify the presentation of the bill before us this evening. That is my privilege as senator.

I will not let Senator Frith deprive me of my privileges. I have been here for eleven years and I have some idea of the privileges of parliamentarians and senators.

I am saying that Senator Frith may have made a few promises. Perhaps he said to the members of the other place and to the Leader of the Government in the Commons: No problem, I will arrange everything and you will have the three readings today.

It is important, and he said so this afternoon, that this piece of legislation be adopted before Christmas because it is very urgent in the eyes of the government. Did you or did you not say so this afternoon?

Senator Frith: No, not before Christmas, but before the end of the year.

Senator Asselin: Well, before the end of the year. Things are different tonight. The government has changed its mind. This piece of legislation came to us at 6 o'clock or 6:30 this evening; but in spite of this, my honourable friend still wants to force the senators to vote on the extremely important underlying principle of this bill. The bill deals with public funds, with our tax dollars. This too is very important.

We are here in the Senate to scrutinize government expenditures and to determine to what use our tax dollars will be put before voting on supply.

Our friend is saying that, as we are here, we shall proceed with second reading. We say that we are not ready and that he is taking us by surprise. He is a brilliant lawyer and I know that he has had a remarkable legal career. He must know that as soon as you tell the court that your opponent has taken you by surprise, the judge will hesitate before deciding that he may proceed. I therefore contend that my honourable friend is not being reasonable.

[Senator Frith.]

This bill does not have to be passed by New Year's day. The interests of Canadian taxpayers are not at stake. The government has told us by not coming back for Royal Assent that they do not need the bill for January 1. Even though I do not have the report of the committee in French, in my mother tongue, my honourable friend tells me: "You must still vote on the principle of the legislation before us." Never! He should know me better.

I believe that for once, we in the Senate have shown this year that we are willing to consider all the legislation referred to us by the other place on the condition that we are given enough time.

Members of the other place must learn that they cannot bring the steamroller into the Senate any time they please, as they have been doing for years.

Every year before Christmas, we receive an important piece of legislation and are told: Hurry and pass this legislation. To comply with the wishes of the other place the senators hurry, sit in committee, consider the bill, and within a few hours, agree to a piece of legislation which is sometimes extremely complex and as important as the one now before us. And this is simply to please, not only the Government but also the Opposition parties in the other place, who have no consideration whatsoever for the Senate. They view the Senate as a tool that must function according to their whims and wishes. There has to be an end to this!

People will rightly say: This Senate, this useless body, must be abolished. If tonight we are forced by the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate to proceed with this Bill, if only to accept it in principle, if he insists, urging us to be reasonable his action will do the Senate a disservice. Again, he would have the Senate appear ridiculous in the eyes of Members in the other place, who have been mocking this institution for so long.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, the question before the Senate is: Is leave granted? I have gathered the impression that leave is not granted.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Senator Roblin: No.

Senator Frith: In that case—

Senator Roblin: Just a moment, I wish to explain why leave is not granted.

Senator Frith: The honourable senator has already done that.

Senator Roblin: I have not; this is another proposition entirely.

Senator Frith: You are refusing leave.

Senator Roblin: I want my reasons to be known, because some who observe these proceedings may be interested to know why we are not taking the opportunity offered to us by my honourable friend to deal with this matter in the way that he suggests.

● (2010)

What is this bill? It is 210 pages in length. I want to know who has read this bill. Who has done anything more than crack the cover of this bill that we are being asked to deal with tonight?

Senator Frith: That is no longer the case; you are not asked to do anything tonight.

Senator Roblin: You want it tomorrow. All right, we have all night to read it. There are 210 pages and we have all night to read them. Is anyone suggesting that we should pass this bill without having a nodding acquaintance with its contents?

Senator Frith: No, just to accept its principle; that is all.

Senator Roblin: "The principle"! I like that expression—"the principle." Here is a taxation bill with 18, or 20, or goodness knows how many more principles in it, and we are asked to debate the principle. What is the principle of this bill? Is it to tax or not to tax? Is it to refund or not to refund?

Senator Frith: It is to implement the budget.

Senator Roblin: It is to implement the budget. Well, if it is to implement the budget, I certainly do not want to debate that principle of the bill because it will surely take longer than January 16 to do so.

Honourable senators, it is not reasonable to ask us to consider this bill in the time limit advised. We have been told that we have had it before us for some time. Since when? When did this bill appear on the desks of the members of this house? Tonight, possibly, or yesterday. The members of this chamber have not had the bill in their hands for days, as my honourable friend has suggested.

Senator Frith: The principle has been before us.

Senator Roblin: Principle! If my honourable friend keeps talking about principle, one will think he is talking about capital punishment. It is capital punishment, all right, but not in the physical sense. It is capital punishment of another sort on a good many of the taxpayers of this country and presents little relief for some others.

Honourable senators, there is no way in which we can discuss this bill in abstract terms of principle unless we deal with its contents, unless we deal with the tax implications that are involved here and matters of that kind. We in this chamber do not yet know what this bill is worth. We do not know how much money this bill represents, in terms of lost government revenue, increased government revenue, taxation of citizens or the category of citizens that will benefit. We do not know of these things. How can we possibly debate the principles which are enshrined in the multitudinous pages of this bill without some further consideration?

I think that on that ground, if no other, we would be well advised to say "No, thank you." The rules protect us to the extent that we have another 24 hours to think about this bill and to do something in respect of it. After that time, if we follow the regular courtesy and custom of this chamber, if we are not prepared to deal with it we can adjourn it and deal with it at a later date, when we will have at our disposal the facts that enable us to consider it intelligently.

I say to my friends opposite that there is a reason why we do not intend to grant leave to consider this bill. As well, I say it is unnecessary. Why should we? What is the pressure? We have until January 16. We have given a fair offer on this side of the chamber. We have said that we will not obstruct the bill, we are not going to be like a dog in the manger about it.

If the government wants Royal Assent given to the bill by January 16, I am sure that if my honourable friend and I went behind the Speaker's Chair, we could come to some kind of agreement that would make that possible. I am prepared to do that. That is a fair offer. But to waive the rules and to leave it until tomorrow—no way!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I take it that that leads, in more simple terms, to the word "no." We will therefore observe the rules.

I move, in strict conformity with the rules, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday, December 23.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, would it be possible to adjourn for five minutes to see whether a reasonable agreement could be reached? After all, Friday is two days before Christmas and perhaps an amicable arrangement could be made if the Acting Leader of the Government and the Acting Leader of the Opposition could get together. I ask honourable senators to reconsider this proposition.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I think that the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate owes us an explanation as to why we should have second reading this Friday, as opposed to some time in January which will meet the deadline of January 16. In my view, the chamber is owed an explanation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if we are to have second reading, it will have to take place sometime between now and January 16. We have to deal with it sometime in that period. The alternative would be to return next week or the first or second week in January. I am simply saying that in my view it is better to dispose of second reading before then and not have to return early in January. It is a judgment call—

Senator Asselin: It is your judgment, your decision. Will you consult with your colleagues?

Senator Frith: Perhaps I have misunderstood. I thought that Senator Godfrey had asked me for my explanation.

Senator Godfrey: Yes, I did.

Senator Frith: That is what I am giving. I am not speaking for anyone else. I have considered many factors. It was my decision that we should deal with the matter this evening and then go home; but I am told that that would not be reasonable. Therefore I suggested that we should deal with the bill tomorrow; but that suggestion was not accepted. Members of the opposition are insisting that we should follow the rules. Therefore I am following the rules, and the earliest date on which we can deal with second reading, in accordance with our rules, is Friday. That is why I am asking honourable senators to support the motion to adjourn second reading until Friday of this week.

There are other choices, and none of them is totally unreasonable; but on balance I believe that my suggestion offers the best method of dealing with second reading. Once that has been completed, we can consider adjourning until January 16.

Senator Roblin: I must point out to my honourable friend that if we are to follow his suggestion and if we are to proceed with the bill on Friday, then, speaking for myself, I will be here. It is not as though we must return for Royal Assent before January 16th, because we have the committee stage to be dealt with and there is a good deal of the committee study that has not been completed. In addition, we have to deal with the report of the committee and with third reading. Therefore we shall be here in January anyway. Therefore I would suggest to my honourable friend—and I hope it is a constructive suggestion—that we get together on this. I believe we could set a date in January, thus avoiding sitting on Friday, and reach an understanding as to the time element involved, so that my honourable friend can discharge his duty. I am sympathetic to his duty. He has an obligation to have the bill assented to, and we have a duty to see that the bill receives Royal Assent under reasonable terms and conditions. We are not entitled to be unreasonable about it, although, of course, the question as to what is “unreasonable” is a matter of opinion. I say to my honourable friend: Why do we not suspend the debate for a few minutes to see if we can decide on a timetable. What does he want to do? He would like to have the bill passed and ready for Royal Assent on January 16. I understand his position, and I am prepared to agree that it should be done. It is merely a question of how it should be done. I hope that he will accept my suggestion that we meet to set a timetable in January, to the benefit of all members of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will know that earlier today we granted the committee power to sit during the adjournment of the Senate, it being an adjournment of more than one week, without a special order. I would prefer to have second reading before we adjourn, in order for the committee to be properly seized of and to study the bill. I do not like the idea of the Senate's sitting until December 23, but I believe that we should at least refer the bill to committee before we adjourn this week. However, if honourable senators would prefer to return early in January, and for the committee to sit in the interim, then let us talk about it. Senator Roblin is refusing to give the bill second reading tonight or tomorrow and he does not even want to deal with it in accordance with the rules. Obviously, there are others who share his view.

Hon. David Walker: Everybody.

Senator Frith: The committee has already reported on its pre-study of the subject matter of the bill and I would like to refer the bill itself to committee. However, if honourable senators wish to suspend the sitting for a few minutes to talk about the matter, let us do so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, the suggestion has been made that we suspend the sitting for a few minutes and come back at the call of the bell. Is it your pleasure to adopt that suggestion?

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should choose a definite time, say, 8.45 p.m. That should give the Acting Leader of the Opposition and me enough time to talk to our caucuses and to each other.

Senator Roblin: There is one final point I would like to make. If we decide to meet on Friday, I for one will be here. However, I cannot give a guarantee that we will not adjourn the debate or that we will be willing to vote on Friday. Of course, the adjournment of the debate is at the pleasure of the house and it is conceivable that our request for an adjournment might be refused. Such a move would require considerable justification. I make these points because I do not want this situation to become even more embroiled than it is already.

Senator Asselin: Even if we sat tomorrow we could adjourn the debate.

Senator Roblin: That is right. But I do not wish to get too disputatious because once you get into a firm position your pride may be at stake and you may have problems of that sort, and this might not be conducive to the harmonious conduct of our business. If the Acting Leader of the Government and I were to meet after meeting with our caucuses, we may be able to hammer something out.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I have no problem as far as attendance is concerned. I am here every day of the week and I have no intention of absenting myself during the holidays. Since the government has accepted the fact that Bill C-2 will not receive Royal Assent before the end of the current year, what is so sacred about giving Royal Assent on January 16? Could it not be given on January 18?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to re-assemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8.45 p.m.?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 9 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad to report that after caucuses and a brief discussion with the Acting Leader of the Opposition we have come up with a compromise—as he says, in the traditional place, behind the Speaker's Chair. The compromise reached is as follows: We proceed now with the debate on second reading in order to hear Senator Buckwold only. Senator Roblin has undertaken that the reply to the second reading will proceed on January 16. It is our objective and hope as part of our understanding that, whatever happens to the debate after that time, the committee will obtain its reference after second reading some time after Monday, January 16. At 2 o'clock on that day the debate on second reading will appear as the first order of the day. It is understood that, although the committee has made a report tonight, it can in the meantime, if it so wishes, continue to study the bill in order to save time.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That is on the condition that the report of the committee will be in the two official languages?

Senator Frith: Yes. That is an interesting point, since the report will appear in the two official languages in the Debates of the Senate for today's date. Those copies of Hansard will be available for everyone tomorrow, but, of course, everyone will have gone home by then. Do you suggest we send copies of the debates to those who want it or to everyone?

Senator Asselin: To everyone.

Senator Frith: Why not? It will be our Christmas wish to them, or, rather, our New Year's wish.

Those are the points of compromise, honourable senators; if I have misstated something, Senator Roblin will correct me. First, however, I wish to thank him, and to thank Senator Bosa and honourable senators for suggesting that we try this approach. I am very much in favour of the solution.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I think we have arrived at a decision in the usual tradition of the Senate, that is, by amicable discussion. It is gratifying to me that we have found it possible to reach an understanding on this matter in the way we have. On this side, we are glad to allow Senator Buckwold the opportunity to make his presentation tonight. It is convenient for him and for us that he should do so and we are glad it will take place.

We feel that our point is covered because we are not now being asked to deal with the matter ourselves. It has been suggested, and I agree, that we should deal with it on the 16th of next month when we meet again. It is reasonable that we should be ready to make our presentation at that time so that the bill can proceed through the committee stage without undue delay. Perhaps it is in the spirit of Christmas goodwill that we have arrived at a solution. If the chairman of the banking committee feels disposed to call his committee for further pre-study, there is nothing to prevent him from doing so.

As far as we are concerned, that covers our grounds. Our position that bills coming before this house receive their proper attention and our concern for the reputation of the Senate and the way in which we conduct our business are adequately protected. On the other hand, the government is getting what it wants, namely, some assurance that the bill will be dealt with in a time frame that meets its requirements. In my opinion, everyone should be satisfied with this solution.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, as the old politician started one speech, he said: "Before I begin my talk, there is something I would like to say". I want to take this opportunity of personally expressing my appreciation to members of the opposition and of the government for making it possible for me to make my humble presentation tonight. I must admit that it would have been almost impossible for me to do so tomorrow because of commitments I have back home. I am most thankful that you have given me this opportunity.

If I may be permitted a little bit of levity, I must admit that there is one aspect of the rules in which I might be faulted, and I pass this on to my legal friends across the way. Section 38 of the rules of the Senate reads:

"All personal, sharp or taxing speeches are forbidden."

I do not intend to be sharp or personal, but I hope that no one will call me on the fact that this is a speech that is taxing. I will do my best to make it as untaxing as possible.

Honourable senators, this bill has three major elements: First, the changes to the Income Tax Act proposed in the April budget; second, the Indexed Security Investment Plan; third, the proposals for changes to the tax incentives for research and development as outlined in the consultative document dated April 19. Finally, the bill also implements a number of technical amendments to the Income Tax Act as announced on April 5th.

First of all, honourable senators, I would like to review some of the major tax measures that are before us. A major element of the April budget was to accelerate productive investment and job creation in the private sector. The bill improves the effectiveness of the federal investment tax credit. It allows credits earned for eligible investment made after April 19th, 1983 to be used without limit to reduce federal income tax payable and unused credits to be carried over for reduction in any of the three previous or seven subsequent years. Also, the investment tax credit will be extended to heavy equipment used in the construction industry. These improvements to the investment tax credit will provide support of approximately $1.3 billion for private investments over the next four years.

As members of the committee will agree, honourable senators, the formula for achieving the particular objective outlined in the bill is complicated. However, I am sure that those who will benefit will be most appreciative of its impact.

The bill provides two incentives relating to investment tax credits that will further encourage new expenditures by businesses that are not currently paying income tax. First, a portion of the credit resulting from expenditures made after April 19, 1983 and before May 1, 1986 will be refunded to the business incurring the expenditure. For small business corporations and unincorporated businesses, 40 per cent of investment tax credits not used to reduce income taxes will be refundable. For other businesses, 20 per cent of such credits will be refundable.

Second, the introduction of the special recovery share purchase tax credit will allow corporations with unused investment tax credits to flow out the credit to investors who subscribe for new equity shares in a corporation. The credit, which may be as much as 25 per cent of the value of such shares, can be offset against the investor's tax liability. Pension funds and other tax exempt investors may obtain an equivalent benefit by obtaining a refund of any share purchase tax credit earned by them. This measure applies to shares issued after June 30, 1983 and before 1987.

I am sure all honourable senators are following my argument in every detail! The fact is that it is a little difficult to follow, but those who are on the committee are well aware of how the flow-through operates.

It is estimated that these two measures should provide a further $640 million of support to private investment. The combined impact of these measures will be to allow many more businesses to take advantage of tax incentives that promote investment and, therefore, to participate in the economic recovery and the creation of long-term employment in the private sector.

The bill also allows business losses to be carried back three years and carried forward seven years, instead of one year back and five years forward as at present. The three-year carry back will be phased in over two years for most businesses, but for small business corporations, this new benefit will take effect immediately. Farmers and fishermen will be immediately entitled to a three-year carry back and a ten-year carry forward of losses. These measures will allow businesses to take advantage of their losses and will increase cash flow by $305 million this year.

I should like to say a word now on the Indexed Securities Investment Plan. Again, I have to admire the people who were able to put into legislative words a very complicated proposal, a proposal which should benefit to a significant degree Canadian taxpayers. The encouragement of Canadians to invest a greater proportion of savings in the common equity of Canadian corporations is an important part of the recovery program and is an important thrust of the last budget. I believe that Canadians should invest a much larger share of their savings in common equity than has been the case in the history of this country. The ISIP is intended to assist Canadian corporations to raise equity and, at the same time, offset the effects of inflation on the taxation of this form of investment gains on the investor.

Though the cost to the federal treasury of the ISIP program will not, for technical reasons, be very great in the first year or so, once the program reaches maturity it is estimated it will involve some $300 million per year in forgone revenues. It is considered that this is a worthwhile investment towards encouraging greater and more widespread equity investment by individual Canadians. Though the plan itself is complex in its operation, this will not be a problem for individual investors. The detailed accounting will be handled by the financial institutions and investment firms that will offer ISIPs.

I want to say a word now about incentives for research and development, which is another major factor. The consultative paper tabled last April 19 showed that Canadian tax incentives for research and development compare very favourably with those of other countries, but that there are areas where they could be made more simple and more effective. An extensive process of consultation ensued, and its results are now reflected in the measures in the bill dealing with research and development incentives.

I might say, honourable senators, that there were many, many consultations with industry and with those involved in scientific research and development in order to come up with a program that would have a real thrust in this important field.

One of these measures will replace the 50 per cent allowance for incremental R&D expenditures with an increase of 10 percentage points in the investment tax credit for overall R&D expenditures. This will simplify the delivery of these incentives and increase their use to business—particularly firms in the hi-tech industry and those with extensive research and development programs.

The other important R&D measure in the bill introduces a new mechanism for financing research. This mechanism will permit the flow-out of a special 50 per cent tax credit to investors by corporations that renounce the tax credits and deductions on their research expenditures. Investors who provide financing to the corporation in the form of equity or debt, or pursuant to specific contractual arrangements, will be eligible for this special tax credit. This measure will be of particular benefit to those corporations which are not currently taxable and, therefore, do not benefit from the existing tax incentives. It will simplify significantly the tax-assisted financing of R&D. I think this is very important because many of these companies that have these incentive programs were not able to take advantage of them because they were not making a profit due to a variety of reasons. Under this program investors will be able to participate in those write-offs through this particular mechanism.

I should like to say a few words about tax measures for the individual Canadian. In addition to provisions aimed at encouraging investment, which I already mentioned, the bill also contains a number of measures that are important to the individual taxpayer. Canadians who purchase a new home before the end of 1984, and who are eligible to contribute to a Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan, will be able to deduct from taxable income in one lump sum the amount needed to bring their total deductions up to the $10,000 limit. Previously, annual deductions were limited to $1,000 per year. The bill also provides that in 1983, as a special short-term incentive, RHOSP holders will be allowed tax-free withdrawals of any amount used for the purchase of designated home furnishing or appliances. These measures have provided a substantial stimulus for the manufacturing and construction industries and for the employment situation in these vital sectors.

The bill also provides for a rise in the employment expense deduction which will increase from 3 per cent to 20 per cent of employment income, subject to the current maximum amount of $500. Approximately 4 million employees whose annual employment income is below $16,700 will benefit from this measure. By increasing the percentage to 20 per cent of employment income, people of lower income will enjoy a significant advantage, the ceiling being the same.

Three major tax components of the federal child benefit system have been changed to help lower income families, working parents and others in need. The ceiling on the child care expense deduction will be raised from $1,000 to $2,000 per child and from $4,000 to $8,000 per family. I believe that is a much needed amendment. The child tax credit has been maintained at $343 for the 1983 fiscal year, and will continue to be fully indexed to the inflation rate in subsequent years. However, to ensure that this credit is applied only to those who need it the most, the bill provides that the family income threshold above which the child tax credit begins to be phased out will remain at $26,300 for 1983 and subsequent years.

Third, for 1983 and subsequent taxation years, the bill will maintain at its current level of $710 the tax exemption for children and other dependents under 18 years of age. The net effect of these changes will be, starting in 1984, to increase government revenues, which will be used to reinforce social programs available to Canadians in need.

Honourable senators, let us provide the certainty and stability of the legislative measures required to support sustained expansion of business investment and employment in Canada, an objective this government is pursuing with a great deal of vigour and which I hope will be supported by all senators.

As I conclude, may I say that the report of Senator Barrow, the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, does give a very full explanation and more detail of many of the items which I have discussed. In due course, Senator Asselin will be able to have someone read it to him and tell him what is in it. I am sure he will enjoy it and find the information Senator Barrow so carefully prepared very informative.

Although there are, as Senator Roblin has indicated, 210 pages in this bill, and it contains some quite complicated and sophisticated legislation, there are really only basically 10 or 12 major items on which the committee concentrated, and many of the other items are relatively insignificant. I am hopeful that the Senate will look with approval on the bill and that the committee will have another opportunity to review this legislation, which, in the opinion of many, will be most helpful to those Canadians who need it most and should contribute to the growth and expansion of this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT—CHRISTMAS GREETINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, January 16, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Honourable senators, just before the motion is put, I would like to say that I believe our proceedings this evening had all the elements of a genuine compromise in the sense that each of us stood for a principle and each of us had to compromise only partially. I thank Senator Roblin for his co-operation.

Honourable senators, on behalf of the government and on my own behalf, I wish to pass along season's greetings to all my colleagues and, of course, to our loyal and hardworking staff of whom we really are very proud, and that includes all of them here this evening—the Debates staff, the Clerk's staff, the pages and everyone who makes it such a pleasure to be a Canadian senator. We thank you and we wish you a very happy Christmas and a very nourishing holiday, in every sense of the word, between now and January 16 next.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the indulgence of the Senate to reciprocate the good wishes we have just received from the Acting Leader of the Government. I should like to say that this evening I had the pleasure of a telephone conversation with my leader, Senator Flynn. He particularly asked me to convey his warm good wishes and season's greetings to everybody in this chamber, whether they are here by appointment of the Prime Minister or whether they are here by the good luck of the public service. I have the greatest pleasure in extending his warm wishes to everyone.

Honourable senators, I think tonight has been an interesting occasion. We in the opposition have stood up for what we think are our rights, and I am happy to say that I think the government recognized the validity of at least some of the points we were trying to make. That is a matter of mutual satisfaction. We can all be pleased with that.

I join with the Leader of the Government in expressing to all here tonight not only those greetings from Senator Flynn but the best wishes from all of us here. I admit that the opposition is pretty thin on the ground tonight; I can count four.

Senator Frith: But it is strong in quality.

Senator Roblin: I am quite satisfied with the quality, believe me, and I wish everyone a merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let me also mention that Senator Petten and I visited Senator Olson today at the DND hospital. He is making excellent progress. He was in excellent spirits, although, as can be expected, he tires very quickly. I am happy to say that he is improving each day and that it looks as though we are going to have our two leaders back with us very soon.

In case honourable senators leave too quickly, perhaps His Honour will permit me to mention that he will receive us in his chambers so that we may greet each other and launch our Christmas holiday in an appropriate fashion. Am I authorized to say that, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: You are. Honourable senators, on behalf of the Speaker of the Senate, who cannot be here this evening, and on my own behalf as Speaker pro tem, I wish everyone a very merry Christmas. In the spirit of peace, amity and understanding, and on behalf of His Honour the Speaker, I invite everyone to the Speaker's chambers now.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, January 16, 1984, at 2 p.m.

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I welcome honourable senators back and thank them for attending earlier than anticipated. The reason for this earlier sitting is that the former Speaker of the House of Commons, Madame Sauvé, has been named Governor General, and, according to tradition, the Governor General receives in this Chamber the new Speaker of the House of Commons. The election of the new Speaker is now taking place in the House of Commons.

Therefore, the Senate will now adjourn, to resume at the call of the bell at about noon, after which His Excellency the Governor General will arrive to receive the new Speaker of the House of Commons.

I am sure that all honourable senators rejoice in the appointment of Madame Sauvé as Governor General and join with me in wishing her well.

Honourable senators, the program for the balance of the day is to adjourn immediately after these proceedings until 2 o'clock, when the eight new senators will be sworn in. We will then proceed with our usual order of business, which, after Question Period, will involve the resumption of the debate on second reading of Bill C-2. Accordingly, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, to resume at the call of the bell.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 12.05 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE NEW SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMMUNICATION FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S ADMINISTRATIVE SECRETARY

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a communication had been received from the Administrative Secretary to the Governor General, as follows:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

January 16, 1984

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 16th day of January, 1984, at 12 noon for the purpose of receiving the new Speaker of the House of Commons.

I have the honour to be
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of His Excellency the Governor General?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 12.10 p.m. His Excellency the Governor General having come and being seated upon the Throne—

The Hon. the Speaker said:

Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod,

You will proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The House of Commons being come,

Their Speaker, the Hon. Lloyd Francis, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfill the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. William C. Petten: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 2 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

---

At 2.05 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

NEW SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received certificates from the Registrar General of Canada showing that the following persons, respectively, have been summoned to the Senate:

Ian Sinclair
Leo Kolber
Philip Deane Gigantes
John Stewart
Michael Kirby
Jerahmiel Grafstein
Anne Clare Cools
Charles Watt

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there were senators without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senators were introduced; presented Her Majesty's writs of summons; took the legally prescribed oath, which was administered by the Clerk; and were seated:

Hon. Ian Sinclair, of Toronto, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Keith Davey.

Hon. Leo Kolber, of Montreal, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Jack Austin, P.C.

Hon. Philip Deane Gigantes, of Montreal, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Renaude Lapointe, P.C.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. John Stewart, of Bayfield, Nova Scotia, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Ernest G. Cotteau.

Hon. Michael Kirby, of Halifax, Nova Scotia, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Charles McElman.

Hon. Jerahmiel Grafstein, of Toronto, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Keith Davey.

Hon. Anne Clare Cools, of Toronto, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Peter A. Stollery.

Hon. Charles Watt, of Fort Chimo, Quebec, introduced between Hon. Royce Frith and Hon. Willie Adams.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senators named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

● (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the government I welcome as new senators eight outstanding Canadians who have made notable contributions to our nation, each in his or her own way. They now add lustre and distinction to our own institution, the Senate of Canada.

[Translation]

I do not intend to address myself to each senator individually, because although they have each distinguished themselves in their respective careers, it would be difficult to evaluate such distinction in terms of merit, and I would rather not run the risk of making comparisons that might offend. As I said before, we are delighted with their appointment to the Senate, but I must warn them we are also counting on them to contribute their talents to our work.

My dear colleagues, I welcome you to this chamber.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, having witnessed this interesting and historic ceremony of taking the oath of allegiance, it is clear to us all that the long drought has been broken and that the Senate is now beginning to receive the reinforcements of quality and character we have long awaited. I wonder whether this particular event is the portent of other news to come from the other chamber about other people. However, that is something about which time alone will offer us the answer.

I do say that we know a good deal about our eight new colleagues. We know that they are all over 30 years of age, although in the case of Senator Cools I feel sure that she had to prove it. We all know that these senators have at least $4,000 worth of real property somewhere, which is a good thing. We also know from their public reputations that they have established a place for themselves in a wide variety of occupations in our country. Some of them I know quite well; the others I shall get to know quite well. I am happy to offer to all of them, on behalf of those of us who sit on this side of the house, our warm congratulations on their appointment to this house, and to inform them of our expectation that they will fulfill their duties with credit to themselves as well as to the Senate.

If there is one observation I might be allowed to make, it is that it is somewhat disconcerting to those of us in opposition to find that our ranks have not been reinforced on this particular occasion. We look forward to the possibility that, before all of the vacancies are filled, some consideration will be given to our need for the same kind of help as that required by my honourable friend opposite. In fact, I am moved to suggest that perhaps I should explore the possibility of co-opting some of these eight distinguished people who have joined us today, because I am sure that we can offer them a good deal more to do on this side of the house than my honourable friend can offer on his side.

However, honourable senators, my congratulations to our new colleagues are sincere. I know that I carry with me the united voices of those of us who sit in opposition in this house, and that I can say to our new colleagues that we look forward to a close association with them in the work we do in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

HON. H. A. OLSON, P.C.
HON. JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

PROGRESS OF CONVALESCENCE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to inform the Senate that Senator Olson was discharged from hospital on Saturday of last week. He is recovering so well that, if anything, he is ahead of the expected curve of recovery. He will be convalescing at home for approximately one month, after which he will return to the hospital for a check up; then, in all likelihood, he will return home for another month of convalescence. So, if things progress as predicted, Senator Olson will be back with us for the first sitting in March.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we on this side are delighted to hear that Senator Olson is making good progress and we look forward to his return.

I should also like to say that Senator Flynn is making good progress and we expect him to be back with us sometime during the next month.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HON. HAZEN ARGUE, P.C.

NOTICE OF IMPENDING ABSENCE FROM SITTING

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received a note from Senator

Argue's office—and perhaps Senator Argue will speak to this himself—explaining that he has to leave at 3 p.m. today in order to meet a representative of the Soviet government at Mirabel airport. I simply mention that in the event honourable senators have questions to put to him now. Otherwise, I will take such questions as notice as the acting leader, if that meets the convenience of honourable senators.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I thank my honourable friend for the notice, but I can tell that the minister can go to Mirabel with our blessing but without our questions.

[Translation]

DISARMAMENT

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to start Question Period by directing a question to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate.

This morning, it was announced that the Prime Minister had received an official invitation from the Soviet Union to pursue his peace mission in that country. Since the Prime Minister does not sit in this chamber and we therefore have no way of questioning him, could the Acting Leader of the Government let us know the Prime Minister's agenda for this peace mission and what he has done since we adjourned for the holidays?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no details on the news mentioned by Senator Asselin. I did listen carefully to his question and I shall try to obtain further details.

[English]

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

STATUS OF FUNDING

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development. The CDIC has released a consolidated financial statement showing that the third-quarter losses for Canadair and de Havilland are $106 million.

Honourable senators will recall that the CDIC had $300 million in equity infused by Parliament in June; that was to see the two companies through the first quarter of 1984. Does the minister think that that sum will be adequate? If not, will the CDIC seek additional funding from Parliament?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): I thank Senator Charbonneau for his question.

The estimate of funds to be required until the end of the first quarter of 1984 is approximately on target. I certainly do not expect any requests for additional funds for the period which ended December 31, 1983.

I shall be coming before Parliament and, in particular, before the Public Accounts Committee and the Finance Committee of the other place, to report on the analysis and assessment of the commercial and financial situation in Canadair and de Havilland. I expect to do that in the first quarter of this year, and I shall be asking Parliament to receive the report and to support my recommendation for the continuation of the aircraft production programs in those two companies.

I should like to make it clear that I shall continue to disclose on a quarterly basis the financial and commercial circumstances in the two companies. I think their prospects are now such that they are definable and understandable, and I am optimistic that the products of those two companies are saleable on reasonable commercial terms in the international and domestic aviation communities.

DISARMAMENT

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVES

Hon. Martial Asselin: The Acting Leader of the Government mentioned earlier that to answer my questions, he would make some inquiries. He should make more inquiries on this subject. The Prime Minister's peace mission is a matter of interest to all Canadians. However, there often seems to be a veil of secrecy over this undertaking. For instance, the Prime Minister met the Secretary General of the United Nations. At the subsequent press conference, we did not receive any indication of the proposals made to the United Nations and what the response had been of the Secretary General. Did the Secretary General of the United Nations accept the Prime Minister's proposal for a round-table discussion on disarmament by the nuclear powers? We have not been told anything about what was said at the United Nations, with the exception of a few brief news items from reporters.

At this stage of the peace mission, it is high time the Prime Minister showed Canadians his hand. He should let us know what objectives he is seeking, when this peace mission will end and what its future will be, based on the manner in which it has been developing since the beginning.

In this respect, I think it is high time a member of the Federal Cabinet made a ministerial statement. We also hope that notice will be given of such a statement so that we can reply. Is this too much to ask of the Acting Leader of the Government?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Asselin that the Prime Minister's initiative on disarmament is of interest to all Canadians. In fact a recent poll showed that 80 per cent of the Canadian population supported this initiative. However, I do not agree with Senator Asselin when he says that the Prime Minister's peace initiative is under a veil of secrecy. This initiative is of interest to all Canadians and most people in this world, and that is why, if further information can be provided, in addition to the information we already have, and that is not under a veil of secrecy as far as I can see, even if Senator Asselin and myself do not agree on this point. If I can add to this a ministerial statement, I will look into that possibility, and if not, I will try and give you all the pertinent details I can.

Senator Asselin: It is difficult for my honourable colleague to give us a ministerial statement. As I already pointed out on a point of order, he is not a Cabinet member. He might ask one of his Cabinet colleagues to send us a ministerial statement so that he will be at one with the Cabinet.

Another aspect is also of interest to us. We would like to know when this peace mission will come to an end. Will it be after the Prime Minister's trip to Moscow? Will the peace mission continue in some other way? Should the Prime Minister decide not to pursue his peace mission, will the Canadian Government take up this peace mission for disarmament? In short, is it a temporary peace mission? Is it the foreign policy of Canada to champion this peace mission throughout the world? Will it be pursued or abandoned, even if the Prime Minister decides to go?

Senator Frith: With respect to ministerial statements, honourable senators, under normal circumstances, without special authorization, my Cabinet colleagues refrain from making ministerial statements on behalf of other ministers, including the Prime Minister. I undertake to seek that authorization for, Senator Austin, Senator Argue or myself. We shall see if that will do any good.

As to the Prime Minister's initiative, I think that the only criterion to keep in mind is that we must give him full support to ensure a successful mission. As I understand the nature of his initiative, it cannot be said that the problem can be solved quickly and easily. The quest for peace has been for a long, long time one of the major concerns of mankind. Still, if we can bring new ideas through a ministerial statement on the peace mission, we will do so, but without necessarily setting a specific date for the end of the mission. In short, our main objective is the successful completion of the peace mission, not the exact time frame required to end this initiative.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: My question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government and has to do with the Garrison project in Manitoba. We know that an agreement was reached between the American and Canadian Governments about the end of November or early December. That agreement was to the effect that they were in favour of studying the possible dangers of the Garrison project in Manitoba.

[English]

In view of the concern of the people of Manitoba, senators and members of the House of Commons, I ask the acting leader to ascertain the outcome of the study that was to take place in December, or that is possibly under way at the present time, and to bring the Senate up to date regarding the results of the study. It would be most interesting if that announcement were made in the Senate rather than our having to wait for the media to bring us up to date.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in undertaking to respond to Senator Guay's question, on behalf of the government and on my own behalf I thank him and Senator Roblin for keeping this important matter before us. As he has underlined in his question today and in previous questions, the situation is constantly changing and we keep hearing different reports on the state of negotiations. Therefore, in thanking him for bringing this to our attention, I agree with him that it is time we had an update and I will try to obtain one as soon as possible.

● (1430)

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Leader of the Government. Could he inform the Senate of the business to be dealt with this week? In particular, I would like to know whether the Senate will sit on Wednesday, because previously we had reserved Wednesdays for committee meetings.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the principal business before us is Bill C-2, which will be further debated today. We have set Wednesday of this week as an informal target date for completion of this bill—or, rather, that is our prediction; it is by no means an undertaking by me or Senator Roblin.

The Senate will probably not sit on Wednesday. Because our procedure of setting aside Wednesday afternoons for committee meetings seems to have worked rather well, we could continue to follow that procedure this week in order to allow those committees which have not yet been constituted this session to have meetings for that purpose.

Only one thing might alter that schedule. The government would like to have consideration of Bill C-2 completed this week. If third reading is given to Bill C-2 on Wednesday, the House of Commons will be placed in some difficulty with respect to Royal Assent because it has a division on the last day of debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. On the basis of the business I foresee in the near future, I would prefer that the Senate sit on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, at which time we would adjourn. We may have to persuade the members of the House of Commons to agree to Royal Assent at 5 p.m., rather than at 5.45 p.m., because of the division.

I mention these possibilities, honourable senators, by way of preamble to my recommendation that the Senate try to allow committees to meet on Wednesday afternoon. However, because of the uncertainty with respect to the granting of Royal Assent to Bill C-2, it may be that we will wish to sit on Thursday to have Question Period and Royal Assent. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has conducted a pre-study of the bill. In light of that fact, the bill may be returned to the Senate speedily and third reading given to it in time to allow for the constitution of committees.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, in connection with the difficulties respecting Royal Assent, I point out that this subject was brought up during the last session. At that time there was a suggestion that we should have alternative procedures for Royal Assent similar to those used in Australia and the United Kingdom. What progress, if any, has been made to bring us into the eighties?

Senator Frith: I must point out, honourable senators, that asking that question of me would be like asking Noah if he had heard about the flood. As honourable senators know, I sponsored the particular inquiry suggesting an alternative procedure for Royal Assent. As to the progress that has been made, the matter is no longer on our order paper. It can be revived. I am trying to keep it alive, and this may be an occasion on which to raise it with the new Speaker of the other place. I thank Senator Godfrey for raising the matter, but I am sure he does not expect it to be of any help to us this week.

Senator Godfrey: I am aware of that, but I do not know why we cannot deal with it expeditiously. The matter was dealt with in Australia 70 or 80 years ago, and in England 20 years ago. Can we not deal with it right away?

[Translation]

EDUCATION

POST-SECONDARY—STATUS OF FUNDING

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Tremblay on December 19, 1983, which concerned the federal-provincial financing of post-secondary education.

Last Spring, the Minister of Finance announced his intention to amend the provisions of the Act governing established program financing so that the 6-and-5 indexing formula could be applied to 1983-84 and 1984-85.

The Government plans on introducing legislation for this purpose during this session.

Negotiations with the provinces about the accountability provisions and the arrangements for post-secondary education after 1984-85 will be undertaken after the 6-and-5 indexing bill is passed.

[Later]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, if I may be allowed, I listened closely to the reply Senator Frith gave to my question of December 19. I should note in passing that the answer was given promptly, for which I would like to thank him.

It seemed to me that there were rather considerable implications in this answer, especially with regard to the fact that negotiations with the provinces about the important conditions of these arrangements would be undertaken only after passage of a piece of legislation at the federal level.

Therefore, I would like first to read his answer, and if the honourable senator agrees, I might ask him a few other questions at another sitting but only after close consideration of the answer he has just given me and for which I thank him.

Senator Frith: The reply I have just given is threefold. During the negotiations which have already taken place, it was agreed that legislation will be passed and that further negotiations will follow.

[English]

THE CABINET

STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to part of a question asked by Senator Murray on December 20, 1983 concerning a statement made by the Minister of Transport before the Macdonald royal commission.

The Minister of Transport informs me that he was speaking on his own behalf when he appeared before the Macdonald royal commission, and not on behalf of the government.

With regard to the second part of the honourable senator's question, which I believe dealt with the general principle of government responsibility and whether some principle had been suspended for the purposes of the Royal Commission on Economic Prospects or for any other purpose, I have not yet received an answer, but I am pursuing the matter diligently.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—VACANCIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, in connection with delayed answers to questions, since the government has now got around to appointing some new members to the Senate, may I ask whether it has finally decided to appoint some new members to the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation? Of the six board members, only one is left besides the president. The minister in charge, the Honourable Ed Lumley, has expressed strong views about the losses sustained, and I am sure he is concerned about the reduced membership of the board. I would like to know who is running the corporation. Will the Acting Leader of the Government make a further attempt to find out whether and when appointments are likely to be made to the board, or whether the operation of the corporation will be left to management?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sorry I do not have the answer to that question. I appreciate that Senator Muir has been asking questions on this matter over a long period. I shall renew my inquiries and shall commence my memorandum by saying, "Guess what Senator Muir asked me about in the Senate yesterday?"

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 21, 1983, the debate on the motion of Senator Buckwold for the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Bill C-2 comprises 210 pages, but I doubt whether its literary qualities will ever enable it to hit the best-seller list.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): The book of the month.

Senator Roblin: In fact, it is a very hard bill to read at all, let alone a best seller. On December 21 the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce gave an oral report to this chamber on the contents of the bill, and on the same day Senator Buckwold moved second reading of the bill, at which time he gave his interpretation of its contents. It was apparent then, and it is doubly apparent to me now, after listening to the speeches and having examined the bill, that it requires more consideration than was recommended to us in the latter part of the month of December. It is a good thing that there has been time for honourable senators to read and digest the meaning of this bill, to draw what conclusions they can from it and to offer such judgments as may seem appropriate on what is an important tax statute.

Tax bills do not simply raise or lower taxes. There are other targets as well. On occasion they profoundly affect the social arrangement and economic activity of our country. Very often—and this is quite true of recent bills—tax bills have had unintended consequences as to their application on the economy of the nation. Therefore, there is a responsibility, particularly on the members of this chamber, to give sober consideration to bills of this kind.

I think that Senator Buckwold's brief required him to emphasize the good things in this bill. He did so, and on the occasion of this first meeting of the new year I intend to follow that good example and also point out that there are substantial matters in this bill of which we approve. Considerable effort has, for example, been given to fine tuning the investment tax incentives of various kinds throughout the tax structure and to improving the treatment of farm losses and business losses. There are new tax credits that should encourage investment, and provisions to make share purchases more attractive. This bill blesses some new kinds of risk investments and reforms the overseas employment income tax situation. It includes new research and development credit incentives; a new initiative for the index security investment plan, which is intended to reduce the taxation of inflation elements in stock profits; and helpful changes to the taxation of personal income. So, viewed in a superficial fashion, these points can be commended, but at the same time they call for deeper examination.

These elements should be examined in a special context, because Bill C-2 does not stand by itself. That point was made by the Acting Leader of the Government on December 21, when we discussed the principles of the bill. He told me that the budget was the principle of the bill. The more I think of that remark, the more applicable I think it is, because Bill C-2 is part of the general posture of the government as it exerts its general demand for money on the incomes of Canadians. This bill is involved with the budget and the fiscal record of the government.

The tax changes in Bill C-2 are only part of that package; the full picture would include a consideration of other tax changes included in that same budget. One of the changes I was looking into is the increase in the federal sales tax. Although it is not included in this bill it is part of the general financial considerations, and it is a fact that the increase in the federal sales tax will raise $805 million more in 1984 than the present tax structure, and that in 1986 it will raise $3 billion more. The tax changes in this bill have some relationship to that tax increase. Although the sales tax increases are not part of Bill C-2, there are other substantial tax increases that are part of it.

I do not recall Senator Buckwold's mentioning the one I am about to raise, but he can correct me if I do not do him credit in this respect. It seems to me that no mention has been made of the reduction in the federal tax credit, one of the provisions included in the bill. The federal tax credit is a sum of $200 which taxpayers are entitled to deduct from their taxes. It is quite an interesting advantage to a taxpayer. This credit is to be reduced to $50 by 1986. In addition to that, commencing in 1984 the $200 reduction will be further reduced by 10 per cent of the amount that the taxpayer pays over $6,000. I do not know why that little hooker was rung in there. This is a common feature of modern tax bills—make matters as complicated as you can while you are at it.

This tax credit will be reduced from $200 over the course of a few years. However, that is not enough. A factor of 8 per cent will also have to be applied. Ten per cent of the amount of tax paid over $6,000 is also to be deducted. What on earth is that? Why does this measure commend itself to the people who write the tax bills of this country? It is a complication which surely ought to be dealt with in a straightforward way. That is very bad business indeed.

Another significant item—which I call an off-budget item, which is not included in the budget, let alone in this bill, but which has a great deal to do with the taxes paid by the people who are covered in this bill—is the unemployment insurance rates. In effect, unemployment insurance rates are a wage tax. I have made this point several times in this house and I expect to do so a good many more times before I am through. It is a wage tax on workers; it is a tax on employers; it is a tax on jobs. In the last 12 months the unemployment insurance rate has gone up 39 ½ per cent, with an inflation escalation factor which has increased it by another 10 per cent. This has resulted in an increase of close to 50 per cent over the last 12 months. It is a direct tax on production. In many cases it is an escalating tax on production since, while it is paid by the manufacturer, it is most often included as an item in the percentage mark-up which wholesalers and retailers apply to prices in order to receive the selling price from the consumer. It is a tax on jobs and it is an escalating one.

The wage ceiling at which unemployment insurance is payable these days is $385 per week. This means that a worker at that level, which is not terribly high, will pay an extra $159.64 per year in taxes. Every worker in the country on unemployment insurance, if he is receiving the maximum rate—and not all are—will have to pay this extra tax. On the same basis, the employer will pay $226.72. For the year 1983 it is estimated that this increase alone in unemployment insurance rates will bring in some $2 billion.

I support unemployment insurance; it is a very good thing; I believe we must have it. However, my point is that the costs cannot be ignored. The incidence of these costs on lower paid workers and on the economy as a whole is significant. Yet this item does not even appear in the budget; it does not even appear in this bill. If tax items could ever be identified, this is surely one of them. However, it is conveniently forgotten about—sloughed off—when we talk about the impact of taxes in this country.

The unemployment insurance tax increase, plus the sales tax increase I mentioned previously, together with the federal tax credit changes, show how relatively small—indeed, insignificant—the tax decreases contained in Bill C-2 are. Any examination of the impact of Bill C-2 on the economy of the country or on the economy of persons is incomplete without some examination of the total picture, of which these facts are certainly a part.

Having established a general background against which I think Bill C-2 should be debated, I then ask myself the critical question. For example, with respect to the tax changes we see in Bill C-2, I ask myself what they really mean. More basically, I ask what good they will do. I believe that is a question which is not asked often enough with respect to tax changes, particularly when we are speaking of those changes which affect business and the economy. We must ask what good these changes will do.

I would like to illustrate the point I am trying to make by referring to another tax change made approximately two years ago with respect to capital cost allowances. Most people call this allowance “depreciation.” Capital cost allowances were changed two years ago because, as they stood then, according to the Minister of Finance, and I quote his words, they were “clearly an anomaly.” If there is one thing which ministers of finance do not like it is an anomaly. This particular one was a high target for elimination and—by George!—it was eliminated. Some two years ago this anomaly, which had to do with the depreciation one can charge in any one year, was eliminated. The Minister of Finance brought in what he himself called the “so-called two-year tax rule.” I will not go into the details, but the effect of the rule was to cut down tax deductions which could be applied to certain kinds of capital investment. The tax deduction was reduced, which in turn raised a great deal of money.

The Minister of Finance said that that measure would not hurt. Two years later we can see just how badly it hurt. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association conducted a survey of its members; two-thirds of the membership reported that the reduced capital cost allowance had adversely affected capital investment spending. In 1981 $13.9 billion was spent by Canadian manufacturers on capital investment. In 1983 the figure was reduced to $8.7 billion. After making a reasonable and generous allowance for the effect of the recession which we have been in, it is still quite clear that the result of this tax change was not helpful. In fact, 36 per cent of those who responded to the Manufacturers' Association's query pointed to the changes in the capital cost allowance as a direct link to the forgone investment they could record in their own firms. There is no question that this change, which was thought to be harmless two years ago, turned out to be anything but.

I believe that illustration points out how our tax manipulations sometimes misfire. Members of the Senate are not ignorant of this fact. How many times in banking committee meetings and finance committee meetings have senators asked the Minister of Finance and his officials what they think will be achieved by the tax fine-tuning which they present to us? We ask them what their expectations are. We ask what the targets are and what the cost calculations will be. We sometimes receive a kind of explanation on these points. Then, later, as often happens, we ask what happened, what good the measures were; we ask the Minister of Finance and his officials whether the changes effected had the expected results. We ask whether or not the results have been audited and if they are worthwhile. Honourable senators, how many times have we received satisfying answers to those inquiries? I cannot remember any. This illustrates what seems to be a fixed habit of mind—the people who write the tax laws of this country make changes which they think will do good things, but they seldom follow through with an audit as to whether or not the changes have worked. In many cases we have ample evidence that the changes have done anything but worked in a satisfactory way for the economy of the country.

This approach to government fine-tuning and tax tinkering brings me to make some comment with respect to the research and development tax incentives encompassed in the bill before us. There are several of them and I think they are imaginative. I hope they will do some good. I think the government is right to worry about research and development expenditures in Canada, because our record with respect to this area is not good. Our record with respect to productivity is not good, as compared to that of our neighbours in the world with whom we must compete. The economic posture of the Canadian manufacturing industry, compared to other nations, is not good. One of the things we need to do is improve research and development in our own country; yet there is probably no other area of tax incentive, at least in the last 10 years, which has received more attention than research and development. Every budget which comes down brings in more changes and more amendments with respect to research and development. There is hardly a tax bill we have received in recent years that has not had something in it to motivate the research and development people in this country. The fact that, every year, there is a need for new measures and new suggestions is, I think, a confession of failure that nobody need dispute; a confession of failure that these measures do not achieve the results that we hope for them. I want to be satisfied that these new proposals will be different. I know that in this case there has been extensive consultation with industry in the country on how to establish a good research and development program. This is a very good thing and I certainly hope that it helps.

I make note of the fact that some of the research and development people have asked to be left alone, indicating that they would as soon work under the old scheme as under the new, or at least they would like to be given the option. I do not think that that has been considered. However, we must be persuaded that these new measures will actually do what none of the previous measures has been able to do, and that is to establish a proper research and development activity in this country. I believe that in this respect the government has a serious blind spot with regard to research and development, because they never seem to include in their thinking on this subject the question of market research. This matter has been discussed in the committees of the Senate, and they have been asked why they do not include market research as one of the items of research which should interest the government. These questions have had no effect, and yet everyone here knows that nothing happens unless you make a sale; that research and development that does not lead to a market situation is not much good; that no matter what you develop, if you cannot sell it you are going nowhere.

A classic example of the kind of situation we get into, because we do not regard market research as being sufficiently important to give it the attention it deserves, is to be found in The Globe and Mail of January 13, 1984. I shall read a couple of passages to indicate the point I am making.

The federal Government yesterday injected another $4.9 million into Telidon, acknowledging the need to apply videotex technology to concrete business applications . . .

Like a ship without an anchor, Telidon is adrift in the absence of content geared to the specific needs of users. A constant criticism of the medium is that it is a technology in search of a job.

I think that says it much better than I would be able to. However, the point that has to be considered is why market research gets the cold shoulder from the government when it comes to devising the rules under which these incentives apply. I would like to see the rules expanded so that we test the market as well as the product, because it is obvious to anyone with any experience of these things that the two go hand in hand. It is, however, something we have so far failed to recognize in our governmental policy.

Leaving that aside for the moment, the question is: Will Bill C-2 do what is wanted in respect of research and development? The official estimate that I have seen is that the bill will generate another $100 million worth of research and development effort in the country, and that is not an insubstantial amount. To put it into perspective, it is approximately one-tenth of the research expenditures of the government itself in Canada today and it is approximately one-fiftieth of the total amount of research and development in Canada today. If my figures are correct, I think it perfectly safe to predict that in 1984 the government will be back again with another proposal for research and development. If this is the magnitude of the effort that this bill will encourage, then it seems to me that it is questionable whether it will do the job. I think, therefore, that we may expect to see further fine tuning and further tinkering with research and development policy since, to date, we certainly do not have a policy that will do the trick.

There are some other aspects of this bill that I find confusing. What is the inflation index policy of the government? What do they think about indexing? In this bill they have three different kinds of indexing, and I would like to ask which they consider the right one.

I would like to zero in on a very narrow area of tax policy—that having to do with child welfare—and record with the house the policies that are apparently enshrined in this bill. The child care expense has been arbitrarily doubled. There is no indexing there; it has simply been doubled. No rationale has been offered as to why this has happened. It is probably a good thing, but it seems to me that it is an arbitrary, ad hoc policy which does not fit in with any idea of indexing. On the other hand, the child tax credit amounts to $343 per annum, and that is fully indexed. When we come to family income, that has a threshold of $26,300. In that case, there is no indexing at all, but it covers the same item, welfare of children. The fourth item, the child tax exemption, is $710, with no indexing.

Therefore, when the focus is narrowed down to the tax provisions with respect to child care, you have four different items of tax policy, with three different approaches to the question of indexing. Perhaps this does not seem to be a terribly important matter, but it certainly is important to the people who are concerned, and I would like to know what the policy of the government is in this respect. Do they index or not? Why do they leave some items in and others out, and why are they completely arbitrary in other circumstances? Is there a national policy on indexing, or is it completely ad hoc? An explanation would certainly help.

However, there is plenty of indexing in another aspect of this bill, namely the indexed security investment plan. This is something brand new, and the purpose of this indexed security investment plan is to increase incentives to channel the savings of Canadians into the common stocks of Canadian enterprise by reducing the tax effect of inflation gains on such investments. That is indeed a worthy goal. I know that this scheme has been extensively canvassed with the investment community and this proposal meets their expectations. I hope it works.

However, when you examine how it works, it also seems quite clear that some investors will get more out of it than others. I think it is clear that those who are traders, those who are in and out and those who are “speculators” will get more out of this plan than will the investors who are in for the longer term. I pass no judgment on whether that is a good or bad effect; I merely say that this appears to be the effect of this particular policy and the manner in which it has been set up. I would like to know the government's views on this aspect. Are they content that one particular kind of investor, namely traders, will be more advantaged by this bill than will those who are longer term investors?

It is also clear that this policy will not work without a substantial cost of administration. The bill provides that the tax calculations, which must be done by experts, will be a part of the structure of this new plan. One of the commentators who examined the cost of operating the system has made an estimate that probably the yield from the first $5,000 or $10,000 invested will be absorbed by the costs of tax administration. In other words, the first $5,000 to $10,000 of tax savings may very well be absorbed by the cost of making out the tax bill. Thus, the small investor is not likely to find as much advantage in this policy as the larger investor.

While I do not think it necessary for me to pass any judgment on the apparent situation at the present time, I would like to know what the government thinks about it. It is their policy, and I would like to know whether my analysis of it is correct and, if it is, whether they feel that that is the best they can do. However, I hope at least that we shall conduct a close audit of this new wrinkle to see whether the actual results justify the advertising. Will new capital be made available for Canadian business as a result of this policy? That is the aim of the government, but the outcome of this policy is certainly a matter of speculation at the moment. I would urge the government to conduct a close audit of this new policy to make sure that it is beneficial, because, unless there are positive and substantial results, the ISIP will join other failed incentive plans. I hope that it does work well. However, I want to find out.

Another innovation that has questionable social implications is the decision to abolish the automatic $100 deduction for charitable donations without a constructive replacement. What will that mean to the charitable institutions of the country? Perhaps nobody knows; but every time we make tax changes we expose ourselves to unanticipated fallout, and the charitable organizations of Canada are concerned that they will become the victims of unanticipated fallout because of this measure to eliminate that $100 deduction. The Association of Charities fears that that will be the result, when the $100 automatic deduction goes, but they have made a constructive suggestion as to what to do about that because they recognize that there are aspects of this that are not entirely desirable. They suggest that the principle of a tax credit for political contributions, which we now know all about, be substituted so that there would be a tax credit for charitable donations in the same way as there is for political contributions, with a credit of 50 per cent of the donation. Politicians have told me that this works well, so I think that it might be suitable for charitable organizations. I think that is something that could well be considered.

Honourable senators, there is one respect in which Bill C-2 qualifies—and, if I may quote a phrase I learned from the lips of Senator Sinclair, it qualifies in spades. It is fully up to the standard that we are now able to expect in taxing statutes; it is fully up to standard in what I call the incomprehensibility factor. In fact, the incomprehensibility factor of this bill could hardly be higher. Those who examine the 210 pages of this bill will find a web of clauses, subclauses and sub-subclauses to the third and fourth degrees; they are linked by cross references, exceptions, reservations; they are moderated by parentheses, brackets and taxation years; the verbiage is dense, tangled and convoluted; there is a thicket of complication and complexity. The average taxpayer is clearly warned off, and only lawyers, accountants and those who are certified specialists can be trusted to make out what is meant by this bill.

Of course, the whole of this trend in tax legislation makes a joke of what we used to call the self-assessing tax system, a system under which taxpayers were actually expected to report the taxes that were due because they understood how the taxes were calculated, and what they owed to the benevolent government was established without the help of outsiders.

To add insult to injury, the other day a report was issued about Revenue Canada setting out the department's policy of "dressing". I have never heard that expression used in connection with taxes before, but I have heard it now. It is called "dressing the taxpayer's return." When a computer says that a taxpayer should have claimed a deduction but did not, the "dressing" consists of putting in a $1 item as the deduction. The computer accepts that, but the taxpayer is left in the dark as to the fact that he could have made a further deduction.

This is an allegation which, I think on the face of it, is well supported, but it is certainly one which requires further investigation. If it is true, it compares in a very invidious way with what the tax collector does when he thinks the taxpayer owes money to the government. He does not put in a $1 item then; he rushes out with his tax collector's hat on and gets the money from the taxpayer one way or another. If this "dressing" policy is a widespread activity of the Department of National Revenue, it ought to stop. When a taxpayer is entitled to a deduction, the tax department ought to let that taxpayer know and should ensure that the taxpayer receives elementary justice, because we know that, if a taxpayer owes the department money, the tax collector is not going to be backward in telling the taxpayer about that. The taxpayer concerned in that situation is usually one who works without the benefit of a lawyer or an accountant, and is usually what is commonly referred to as the "little man," because those of us who hire tax experts do not find that type of error cropping up very often.

It seems to me that we will undermine the whole basis of the self-assessing tax system and will not be able to rely on a taxpayer to make out his tax return properly, if we make it so complicated that he cannot understand it, and if when he fails to do it properly, instead of giving him credit for any errors he might have made, we refuse to do so, while, at the same time, certainly making sure he pays up any moneys owing to the government.

I should like to challenge any honourable senator to read pages 54 to 70 of this bill. That section consists of 26 pages and deals with one thing: adding another layer of the tax rules to the oil and gas industry—another layer to the horrendous bulk of tax law already developed by the national energy policy with respect to that industry. If any honourable senator is inclined to read those pages, I defy him to tell me that he understands them. The burden they impose upon the industry is monstrous and gets bigger all the time. That indicates the kind of complexity we are introducing into our tax law.

In the bill itself the government recognizes that the ordinary person cannot handle that complexity. When it comes to the indexed security investment plan, the bill itself provides that the taxpayer not make out his tax return in that connection but that an administrator make it out, and he must be paid for what he does. The bill recognizes that the ordinary taxpayer cannot keep track of the gains and losses under that plan, and the government clearly does not expect him to do so. It actually legislates in this bill that the taxpayer must leave the calculations to tax administrators and must pay for their services, and I have already mentioned what the cost of those services is likely to be.

It is common knowledge that tax planning caused by bills such as this is a major industry that occupies some of the best legal, accounting and business brains in the country without adding anything to the economy, while taking a great deal away from efficiency and growth.

There is nothing new in that statement, because some ten years ago a private citizen by the name of Donald Johnston wrote a book on the subject of cost effective tax laws and proved his case to the hilt. I think he is proud of that book and has every right to be. However, since he wrote that book, the tax jungle has grown and spread, and now this same Donald Johnston is translated; he is the Honourable Donald Johnston, Member of Parliament and a senior minister in this administration. Believe it or not, he still has the same old complaint he made ten years ago; but, instead of writing a new book, the Honourable Donald Johnston chose to appear before the MacDonald royal commission, and chose to do so in St. John's, Newfoundland. I don't know whether he thought that we would not hear what went on out there, but we have. He made an eloquent statement. What I shall now read comes from page 6 of his presentation to that commission. It states:

The government can encourage this trend by simplification and integration of taxes and its financial dealings with businesses, in such a way that businesses know where they stand and that the reward for "creative" tax and financing arrangements is reduced. Seen in this context, simplification of taxation and incentive programs is not merely a matter of housekeeping, but a fundamental reorientation towards productivity. I strongly feel that this is a direction we should take.

Well, he will not get any argument from me about that statement, but it is curious that a policy maker—a man sitting at the very top of the policy tree—appeared before a royal commission to advise that commission to advise the policy maker what he, the policy maker, should do, when the policy maker could do it without any intervention of a royal commission at all. What kind of curious situation is that? I think a fair way of characterizing that performance is to call it an “Alice in Wonderland” performance. It is curious that a minister of the Crown should appear before a royal commission to tell the royal commission what it should tell the ministers of the Crown to do when the ministers of the Crown themselves know what to do without having to talk to the commission at all. Lewis Carroll would have understood this very well.

The Canadian tax system generates unwarranted and unaccounted costs. It is a burden on productivity; it is a burden on workers; it is a burden on enterprise. It is too complicated, and getting more complicated, and these complications ought to be reduced. Taxes, as levied in Canada, are a major obstacle to a better functioning economy.

Whatever good it does, Bill C-2 does not cut down on the tax jungle; it increases it; it does not decrease taxes, because there are more taxes involved on the increase side than on the decrease side; it does precious little for society or the economy; and it is the latest instalment of a 15-year record of poor fiscal policy.

Bill C-2 will be passed by the Senate; the government majority will see to that; but I intend to protest it. I intend to protest not just Bill C-2, but the whole fiscal policy of which it is a part, and I will protest it in the only way I can in this chamber, by voting against it when it is presented for the count.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Buckwold speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, in standing to continue the debate on Bill C-2 and, in this case, to conclude the argument on second reading, the first thing I should like to say is that I agree with a great deal of what the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has so ably presented to the Senate today. I do not think that there is any doubt in the minds of honourable senators on the government side or the other side, or of Canadians generally, that we do have a tax jungle, and it is a very good thing that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has, once again, so ably drawn to the attention of the Senate—just as members of this side have done on many occasions—the complexities, the difficulties, the entanglements and the problems of a tax system that cries out for tax reform.

The welcoming of new senators today reminded me of the first task we had to perform in this house after I was appointed in November 1971. The item for consideration was tax reform. As you may recall, there was to be an omnibus bill that would wipe out all complications. We worked continuously on that legislation, even sitting on a Saturday, and we would have had a sitting on Sunday if necessary to complete the debate. I recall being impressed with how hard the Senate worked at that time because we really took the matter very seriously.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Don't we work hard any longer?

Senator Buckwold: On this side we work, but, of course, you fellows might have a different opinion. What I am really trying to say is that we agree—at least I agree, I cannot speak for everyone—that the important and trenchant points made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition are fully in accord with the feelings of most of us. Nevertheless, Bill C-2, as the Deputy Leader of the Government has indicated, really puts into legislative form the budget brought down last April. As such it is an attempt to improve the economy of the country—an economy that needs to follow the direction indicated by this bill. It is a bill to increase the raising of much needed capital; it is a bill to assist lower income individuals—and I am sure that the committee will look at the impact on those taxpayers; it is a bill to improve R&D; it is a bill to get Canadians back to work; it is a bill to restore general confidence in the business and labour communities. Whether or not the bill succeeds, I believe that all honourable senators will agree that it is a serious attempt to meet head on some of the problems we have faced over the past several, and very difficult, years—problems that required the kind of action taken in this bill. I would be the first to admit that some of those problems that required the kind of action taken in this bill. I would be the first to admit that some of those problems have been caused by the government itself; but I do give credit to the government in respect of this budget for at least addressing the problems and trying to do something about them.

When we take into consideration the 4 million taxpayers in 1983 who will have some refunds as a result of this budget, I think that does have an impact on the average taxpayer. When we see the rush of interest in R&D, I believe that could have very positive results for the economy of this country. When we look at the implications of many of the very complicated and sophisticated approaches in trying to meet the objectives of the bill, I think Canadians generally will be satisfied. Again, I am not minimizing in any way the complexities that have been pointed out or the impossibility of the average taxpayer's being able to comprehend what is going on. I agree that the tax laws have reached the point where you need a specialist, and not just a chartered accountant, to interpret them. That applies to this bill.

I believe that Canadians generally are sincere and honest taxpayers, despite anything we might hear to the contrary. I heard this story about a taxpayer who wrote to the department to say that he had not paid enough money and that his conscience was bothering him so much that he could not sleep at night. He said: “Enclosed, please find $100. P.S. If I still can't sleep, I'll send you the balance." I do not think that is typical of the average taxpayer. I think the government recognizes that it will have to do something about the very issues that have been so ably raised by Senator Roblin.

At this stage I do not want to go through the individual points made by Senator Roblin, although all of them are worthy of discussion. In committee we had a general overview from our own advisers, and officials from the department guided us through this complex bill. Undoubtedly, the committee will continue to study it, and Senator Roblin and his colleagues, as well as honourable senators on this side, will ask many questions to try to clarify the implications of this bill. In general, I feel that this bill is heading in the right direction. It certainly is moving Canada in the direction we would like to see it go. Despite the problems we face, it should be able to achieve its objective of putting Canadians back to work as well as a budget can, to achieve its objective of increasing the productivity of our nation and of improving our trade balances in order to get Canada back on the road to recovery. But if it does even some of that, then I say this house should support it. I ask your support for Bill C-2 as it is being put to you now for second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Roblin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Martial Asselin: When will this committee be meeting?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I was told on the weekend that the committee plans to meet tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, before the joint sitting of the Senate and the House of Commons to hear the Premier of China. You might check the time with the committee clerk.

● (1520)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think this matter should be clarified because we cannot have committees meeting at the drop of a hat; we have to have some notice. I think we should be told right now when this committee will meet because, if it is the intention to meet at about the time of the speech to Parliament by our Chinese visitor, we may have to make alternative plans. I would urge my honourable friend to tell us exactly when the committee intends to meet.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I knew that, of course I would tell my honourable friend. The committee chairman is not in the chamber at the moment. Perhaps, when honourable senators return to their offices this afternoon, a notice will be on their desks indicating when the meeting will be tomorrow morning. I agree with Senator Roblin that we should have sufficient notice. As honourable senators know, the decision as to when the committee will meet is up to the committee chairman. I understood that he planned to hold a meeting tomorrow morning.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not wish to be unduly combative, particularly on our first sitting day this year, but I remember how urgent the plea was on December 21 last that we should deal with this bill expeditiously when we returned, and I agree with that. I believe, therefore, that we are entitled to have a little more accurate plan as to how we intend to proceed in order to pass it by the end of this week, as my honourable friend indicates would be desirable. I am willing to co-operate, but I think we should know what we are expected to do.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the urgency still exists, and that is why Senator Barrow wishes the committee to meet tomorrow morning. When I left my office to enter the chamber, I did not have a notice of the committee meeting. It may well be there when I get back. As of last night, the intention was to meet tomorrow morning.

Senator Roblin: When?

Senator Frith: I have just received some news hot off the press.

Senator Roblin: Good.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet tomorrow at 9 a.m.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend; that is service with a smile.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, January 19, 1984, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Honourable senators, if leave is granted, I shall give an explanation.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I mentioned yesterday, the program for this week is principally to continue the debate on Bill C-2. The government hopes that the bill will receive Royal Assent this week.

The committee to which the bill was referred following second reading—namely, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—considered the bill this morning and will continue its deliberations when the Senate rises this afternoon. If the committee completes its deliberations on that basis, it will be in a position to report tomorrow or Thursday. Yesterday I sensed support for the idea of continuing to sit on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 2 p.m., leaving

Wednesday afternoons free for committee meetings. My proposal is that we not sit tomorrow but adjourn until Thursday at 11 a.m., because if the bill is reported on Thursday and third reading debate is completed on Thursday morning we could have Royal Assent at 12.45 p.m., just before the other place adjourns for lunch, rather than wait until it adjourns at 5.45 p.m.

On inquiring about the prospects for receiving legislation from the other place, I was told that we cannot expect any next week. Therefore, I propose that we not sit next week but that we sit on Tuesday of the following week at 2 p.m., pursuant to the same program. My concern is that when I propose that we not sit a certain week I often receive complaints from committee chairmen that they have meetings planned and have arranged for the attendance of witnesses. I am not aware of any committee meetings having been arranged for next week, apart from meetings of joint committees. I see that Senator Godfrey, perhaps the soon-to-be-elected joint chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and Senator Murray, who is a member of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, are shaking their heads. That being the case, the only meeting I am aware of is the annual meeting and dinner of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group next Tuesday.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I see nothing in the proposed program that need cause us any difficulty. I recall that on December 21 last we on this side undertook to advance Bill C-2 with all convenient speed, and it seems to me that with the time left for the committee we should dispose of it easily—perhaps not this afternoon but certainly by Thursday. While an hour and a half between the sitting of the Senate on Thursday at 11 a.m. and Royal Assent at 12.45 p.m. may put a crimp in Question Period or curtail some of the speeches we might make on third reading of Bill C-2, we on this side will try our best to accommodate our honourable friend.

I do not think there is a problem in the world about next week. No committees, apart from the ones the deputy leader has mentioned, have any business before them, so they will not meet. I have a strong suspicion that the other two committees may find it possible to avoid meeting next week. So, on that basis, having given leave for the presentation of this motion, we shall support it.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I might say that the policy of the Regulations and other Statutory Instruments Committee is to meet whether or not the Senate is sitting.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MARITIME COMMAND—SERVICEABILITY OF SHIPS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence attempted to review the fleet off Halifax. Six ships were supposed to participate in the exercise. One ship was like the Prime Minister—unwilling to leave dock; two others were like the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration—unable to leave the harbour; the remaining three ships carried out a limited exercise. In spite of this performance, the Minister of National Defence announced that the navy was in top shape and in a state of high performance. I should like to know what standard he used in coming to that conclusion. Did he use the federal cabinet as a standard, since that body operates at considerably less than 50 per cent of its capacity?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure what standard the minister used. I suppose there were many standards available to him, including the one referred to as a matter of opinion by Senator Phillips. He might have been able to use the Conservative Party as a standard, for example, where things do not always work perfectly—just as they do not in any other human organization.

I heard the minister's explanation and I cannot add much to what he said. However, for those who did not hear it, the naval authorities and the minister pointed out that it is doubtful that there is any human organization—indeed, any navy anywhere in the world—where everything goes right all the time. Yesterday was a day when things went wrong on a particularly unfortunate occasion.

An Hon. Senator: And how!

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Leader of the Government. During the discussions that took place this morning between the Prime Minister and the Premier of China did the Prime Minister either request the loan or suggest the purchase of ships from the Chinese navy?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe I can safely say no. However, if I am corrected, I will then make a supplementary explanation at the time of delayed answers.

DISARMAMENT

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVE

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, in his address to the other place this morning, the Premier of the People's Republic of China indicated that his government was fully behind our Prime Minister's peace initiatives, but he was rather vague as to the willingness of the Chinese government to accept one of the first objectives advocated by the Prime Minister, namely, to set up a round table of all the nuclear powers to address the issue of disarmament.

At noon today, I heard on the radio some announcers who suggested that the Prime Minister had not received from the Chinese Premier the complete assurance that China would accept to participate in such discussions.

Is it true that China is unwilling to accept this essential and vital objective advocated by the Prime Minister, namely, the setting up of a round table of all the nuclear powers to address the issue of disarmament?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): On the basis of information now available, honourable senators, I can say that China has neither accepted nor refused to participate, but that it has simply indicated today its support for the Prime Minister's initiatives.

I suggest that it was implied in the Premier's support for these initiatives that China would participate in round table talks such as that advocated by the Prime Minister, if and when they are held.

I have not heard the radio broadcast, but it is clear that the Chinese Premier has neither accepted nor refused to participate. He has only indicated that China supported the Prime Minister's peace initiatives.

EDUCATION

POST-SECONDARY—STATUS OF FUNDING

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. It stems from his reply to the questions I asked in December 1983 concerning the discussions on post-secondary education funding.

If I understand the answer he gave me yesterday, legislation would first be enacted to implement what the Minister of Finance announced last Spring, namely that the six-and-five rule would apply to the federal Government's grants for, or funding of all of the established programs, that is, as I understand it, the health programs and post-secondary education funding, generally.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): On what page is that, Senator Tremblay?

Once the legislation is passed by Parliament, negotiations with the Provinces would take place concerning the accountability procedure and the arrangements with respect to post-secondary education after 1984-85.

In his letter of early 1982 to the Provinces, the Prime Minister clearly indicated that the federal Government would take a new approach to its funding of post-secondary education.

More specifically, this would evolve within the framework of national goals set by the federal Government for post-secondary education.

It was on the basis of that statement that the discussions I referred to on two occasions in my questions were opened between the Secretary of State and the provincial Education Ministers.

My first question, in view of the answer I received yesterday and the subject matter of the forthcoming negotiations to be held after the six-and-five legislation is passed is as follows: Has the idea of national goals being determined by the federal Government for post-secondary education disappeared or been dropped from the discussions between the Secretary of State and the Provinces?

This is a first question, and depending on the answer I get, I may have a supplementary if the Honourable Acting Leader of the Government will allow it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if my interpretation of the answer I gave yesterday is correct, the answer to the question just asked by Senator Tremblay will be found in the legislation, I hope. Therefore, we will have to wait for the legislation to see whether its underlying principles might provide an answer.

I have no other information, but I can try to find out whether the answer I have just given is justified. If not, I can always correct it later on.

Senator Tremblay: If the honourable senator will allow me, I will rephrase my question. I have learned from various quarters that the federal government's first intention in 1982 was to set so-called national objectives in that obviously exclusive field of provincial jurisdiction, and to make that a prerequisite of any federal participation in post-secondary education financing. I was told that the provinces reacted so strongly during the discussions which took place that the Secretary of State, for one at least, has decided not to pursue the matter any further and that future negotiations will not go beyond the objective defined here.

Given the stakes involved in the very principles of this issue, may I ask the Acting Leader of the Government to inquire of the Secretary of State whether he would confirm that the federal government will no longer make any attempt to set national objectives in post-secondary education?

Senator Frith: Of course, I can only answer for the federal government, including the Secretary of State.

I have noted and I may submit to the Secretary of State the additional information contained in the supplementary question asked by Senator Tremblay.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION

STATUS OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, although I see that there are two ministers of the Crown in the chamber, I wish to address my question to Senator Frith, the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question relates to Bill S-31, which was before the Senate in 1982 but expired when the last session was prorogued. When the Senate was considering that bill, the Leader of the Government in the Senate told us that its basic objectives would remain government policy and that its deadline of November 2, 1982 would stand. Consequently, there appears to be a shadowy area concerning the intentions of the government with respect to that legislation. Is the government considering introducing a successor bill to Bill S-31? If so, does the government intend to insert that cut-off date of November 2, 1982 in the successor bill?

I ask that question for the obvious reason that those who will be affected by the successor legislation need to know the intentions of the government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Roblin that it is important that members of the public dealing in the shares of the companies referred to in what was Bill S-31 know what the government's intentions are. That is why Senator Olson made it clear that those people should assume that it was the government's intention to introduce new legislation and that the November 2 cut-off date would be inserted into that legislation. That was certainly so when Senator Olson made those comments and I have had no indication of a change.

I think it is quite fair for Senator Roblin to give the government an opportunity to reaffirm that expression of intent or to amend it, if there is going to be a change. I shall try to obtain that information as quickly as possible.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. While he is making his inquiries, if it turns out that the successor to Bill S-31 is indeed on the waiting list, will he find out whether that bill will be introduced in the Senate; and, if so, will he attempt to find out the date on which we may expect it?

It seems to me that, if this matter is to remain government policy, it is time we had another debate on the subject in order to have the matter clarified and disposed of.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I shall attempt to make clear the government's intentions with respect to successor legislation—the timing and its intent as to the cut-off date—and I shall also attempt to determine whether the government intends to introduce such legislation in the Senate or in the House of Commons.

ENERGY

PETROLEUM INCENTIVE PROGRAM—STATUS OF GRANTS FOR CANADA LANDS EXPLORATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I now wish to address a question to the Honourable Senator Austin. I know that he still has a keen interest in the topic of oil and gas and, because of that, he might be the best minister to address this question to. My question relates to the PIP grants available for exploration in the Canada lands.

If my figures are correct, I understand that $7 billion may have been committed over a five-year period with respect to those exploration grants. I am informed that, despite the fact these works are now proceeding, none of the basic exploration agreements between the government and the companies concerned has actually been signed. I should like to find out if that statement is correct, and, if it is, how many of these agreements are still incomplete. If it is not true, the minister might be able to tell me how many of the agreements are complete and how many are pending. At the same time, I would appreciate his telling me how many dollars are involved in each instance.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, in my ministerial capacity I am in no way responsible for energy or for answering Senator Roblin's question, but I shall seek the answers, which will take a few days, and I shall endeavour to reply or shall ask the deputy house leader to reply to your question.

PRIVATE BILLS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY FOR JANUARY 24, 1984

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I would like to point out to the Acting Leader of the Government and to Senator Leblanc as well the fact, last December 20, they scheduled the debate on second reading of four private bills for January 24, 1984, which will be next week. However, we have been told that we shall not be sitting next week. Do you intend to put all these bills back to another week or to change their date for second reading?

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Senator Asselin, I do not have with me all the necessary material. If I receive it—but I do not have it yet—I may be able to introduce these bills this week. If we are not sitting next week, I suppose this will automatically be put back to the following week.

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, it is important to know when these bills will be introduced. It had been announced for January 24. We have therefore asked a senator on this side to prepare a reply to the bills scheduled for January 24. We would like to know when it is proposed to introduce them so that we may give an intelligent reply.

My question is simply this: When do you intend to introduce them? Will it be in January or in February? We want to organize our business accordingly.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Leblanc may wish to add something, but as Senator Asselin is well aware, there are procedural aspects, preparations which must be made. We can try to have a reply for Thursday to report progress in this regard.

Senator Asselin: You will understand that in the case of this type of private bill, we need to consult some papers to be able to prepare a reply. If the Acting Leader of the Government tells me that he will be able to give me a satisfactory answer on Thursday, I shall agree to it.

Senator Frith: This will clarify the situation as it is not clear for the moment.

Senator Asselin: I believe that the same problem applies to motions. The motion standing in the name of Senator Lafond is also scheduled for January 24. Is he planning to introduce it later, and if so, when?

Senator Frith: If the Senate agrees, I believe that Senator Lafond plans on introducing his motion today.

Does Senator Leblanc have anything to add about his private bills, or is he willing for us to try to have the information for Thursday?

Senator Leblanc: I shall be here until Thursday. I would personally have nothing against introducing these bills on Thursday, with the unanimous consent of the Senate. However, I would have to receive from the Senate's legal advisors all the documents required to make an intelligent presentation.

Senator Frith: I promise to report on the matter.

Senator Asselin: You have not answered my question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Leave having been granted to proceed to the motion for Tuesday, January 24, 1984:

Hon. Paul C. Lafond, pursuant to notice of December 20, 1983, moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to hear evidence on and to consider matters relating to national defence;

That 12 senators, to be designated at a later date, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada, and to such places abroad where members of the Canadian Armed Forces may be stationed;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional and clerical staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject before the Subcommittee on National Defence of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs during the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament be referred to the Committee.

He said: Honourable senators, I will not speak at great length because the case for a Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence has been made previously, and in this regard I would refer honourable senators to my motion on Standing Rules and Orders in Debates of the Senate of June 28, 1983. There is general agreement among the senators who served on the late subcommittee that there is a requirement and that it is in the best interests of Canada, our armed forces and the Senate to have such a special committee.

As I stated previously, I think it is important that our armed forces, as well as our allies, know that one body in the Parliament of Canada concerns itself exclusively with matters of defence. This requirement is enhanced by a good number of verbal requests I have received that initiatives be taken by such a committee.

Some time ago, the Conference of Defence Associations commissioned a paper on industrial mobilization in Canada. This was prepared by Brigadier General William J. Yost, retired, who is now Planning Co-ordinator for Civil Mobilization. The paper, which Brigadier General Yost presented to the Conference of Defence Associations, was published last week. I would quote one of his recommendations which states:

It is recommended that the CDA executive consider the possibility of initiating a study on "Canada's Industrial Preparedness for Defence", by the Sub-Committee on National Defence of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. Even when studies of this type are not immediately accepted by the Government, they are immensely useful in revealing the details surrounding a problem for further study, and for providing the general population with an understanding of important issues.

I think this is the type of recommendation we are hearing from a good number of people, that is, that our efforts should be continued exclusively in the field of defence in Canada. I urge honourable senators to support the formation of a special committee.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might add a brief word to what the mover of this motion has already said, to indicate my support of the proposal he has placed before us. I have been a member of the subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was the original home of defence concerns, so it does not become me to be too laudatory in describing the work of that subcommittee. I can, however, bear testimony to the effective leadership given to that committee by Senator Lafond. I think honourable senators who have had anything to do with it are impressed with the zeal and common sense with which he pursued his responsibilities as chairman of the subcommittee. I hope that I will be one of those serving under his leadership of this special committee in its continuing work.

With respect to the wording of the motion itself, one paragraph has been pointed out to me by one of my colleagues as perhaps deserving notice. It states:

That the committee have power to adjourn . . . to such places abroad where members of the Canadian Armed Forces may be stationed;

Although I stand to be corrected, I believe it is not generally the custom to give to committees the power to meet abroad; they must have the special consent of the Senate as the occasion arises. I think, however, that an exception could certainly be made in this case. In view of the nature of the committee's concern—namely, the Canadian armed forces of defence—it seems reasonable that, when it thinks it ought to, the committee should have the ability to visit the Canadian armed forces, wherever they may be stationed, without any special reference to the Senate in that connection. Therefore, although this may be an unusual provision, I by no means oppose it.

I am pleased to see that the committee will be empowered to retain the services of professional and clerical staff as deemed advisable. It has always seemed to me to be one of the great advantages of the Senate committees that they have the freedom to pursue their endeavours with the best advice they can find, without any reference to, if I might put it this way, what the government of the day might think about what they are doing. It is a good thing that our committees have that degree of independence. Long may it continue.

Honourable senators, I think this is a good resolution and I would be pleased to vote for it.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, as former chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, under which Senator Lafond's subcommittee was constituted some time ago, I should like to say a few words. Along with all other members of the committee, I was more than supportive of the idea that the subcommittee be established. The work done by that subcommittee has been outstanding. I divulge no secrets when I say that I have expressed my view quite openly to various senators and to the powers that be in the affairs of the Senate, if I may use that expression, that, in light of the suggested reduction in the size of Senate committees, which I think will make them much more effective, it would seem appropriate that this subcommittee become the Special Senate Committee on National Defence.

Honourable senators, I simply wish to say how proud I was, as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, to see the formation of Senator Lafond's subcommittee. I very much welcome his motion to see the work of that subcommittee continued by a special committee of the Senate.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, may I offer some clarification regarding the paragraph queried by Senator Roblin? Within the ambit of our current investigation of the aerial territorial defence of Canada, it is highly probable that the committee will be called upon to visit Colorado Springs, the location of the headquarters of NORAD. That is one of the reasons for the insertion of that paragraph.

● (1440)

In pursuing our inquiries into Air Command, outside of aerial territorial defence, we may well have to visit Lahr and Baden Soellingen. That is why the paragraph itself was circumscribed to some extent by saying, "where . . . Canadian Armed Forces are stationed." Obviously, that does not give us authority to travel all over the world. However, I have no objection to requesting the Senate's authorization on each occasion.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, January 19, 1984. at 11 a.m.

ADDRESS

OF

HIS EXCELLENCY ZHAO ZIYANG PREMIER OF THE STATE COUNCIL OF THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1984

---

His Excellency, the Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China was welcomed by the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Maurice Riel, Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable Lloyd Francis, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Lloyd Francis (Speaker of the House of Commons): I now invite the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to introduce His Excellency, the Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Premier Zhao Ziyang, distinguished guests, honourable members of the Senate and the House of Commons, Canada and this Parliament are greatly honoured today to have in our company a most distinguished guest, the Premier of the People's Republic of China.

[English]

Mr. Premier, I welcome you on behalf of the people of Canada. You have come to a land of icy skies and snowy ground and you have come as a friend. This is a unique and momentous occasion. It is unique because it is the first time that a Chinese Premier has come to Canada and the first time that a high official of the People's Republic of China has addressed us. It is momentous because this occasion constitutes a recognition of the very special ties which unite our two nations and underscores the fact that Canada's relations across the Pacific are an increasingly important factor in our foreign and economic policies.

Canada is a very young country by Chinese standards. Two hundred years ago, Ottawa was a clearing in the woods. Two thousand years ago, China was at the height of civilization.

Chinese artists and philosophers produced works still regarded as masterpieces today. During the dark and middle ages in Europe, a steady flow of Chinese inventions and processes enriched our civilization; the compass, gunpowder, silkmaking and printing, for example. During the enlightenment Chinese artistic design took the salons of Europe by storm.

China, as the middle kingdom, has always played a pre-dominant role in the world. During many periods in its history its influence had spread well beyond the boundaries of Asia. Certainly today China has regained its full eminence as a force to be reckoned with in world affairs. Its strong leadership role in the Third World, its advocacy of better North-South and South-South relations, for example, are well known and widely respected. China's strong opposition to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and its support for the Cambodian coalition government are equally important in the Asian balance of power.

We in Canada share many of China's concerns and attitudes on these questions and consider close consultations such as we have this morning with the People's Republic of China as an important part of our foreign policy. We are proud of having established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China in 1970, and are extremely pleased that since then our bilateral relationships have achieved such variety, depth and warmth. Over the years many have contributed to the relationship both in China and in Canada. Today I pay tribute to them. We speak often of Norman Bethune and of Chester Ronning and rightly so. But going back even into the 19th Century there were thousands of others whose work has brought us to where we are today.

When I made an official visit in China in 1973, the current phase of our relations was very much in a formative stage.

Nevertheless, a number of understandings were reached, the fruits of which we are seeing today. In areas of family reunification, of cultural and sporting and academic exchanges, substantial and in some cases dramatic progress has been made. To cite just three examples, as of the end of last year, some 22,000 Chinese have been reunited with their relatives in Canada. Over 1,300 scholars and students from China have been received by Canadian educational institutions. Scores of prominent Canadian and Chinese artists and sports teams have performed in each other's country.

Like so many Canadians, as a young boy I was utterly taken with the mystery and excitement of Chinese history and geography and steeped myself in your myths and traditions. Later, I began what has been a life-long fascination with your philosophers, artists, strategists and historians. It seemed obvious to me even then that to the extent that the world could not benefit from Chinese experience and vision it would be a poorer place.

It was therefore with particular satisfaction that I found myself in a position to initiate the process which led to the establishment of diplomatic relations between our two countries. I hope that experience helped to speed China on the course which returned your country to the world stage and once again enabled its wise counsel to be heard in the community of nations. Some of the most valued memories of my visit to China in 1973 include the opportunity to meet Chairman Mao Tse-tung, to discuss politics with Chou En-Lai far into the night, and to be accompanied on my travels to the south of China by Chairman Deng Xiaoping whose wise opinion on world affairs I have always respected.

[Translation]

A country of great tradition, China has, as I remarked earlier, been the origin of many scientific discoveries for hundreds of years. Canada still has much to learn from China, but nevertheless, there are areas in which Canada could make a very useful contribution to your modernization program. I am thinking, for instance, of a number of high technology sectors, as well as the development of your resources, especially the oil and gas industry, both on the mainland and offshore.

In the space of nearly fourteen years, Canada's trade with the People's Republic of China has grown until today that country has become our fifth largest market. Chinese exports to Canada have also risen significantly over the years and this trend should continue.

[English]

Mr. Premier, if harmony distinguishes our bilateral relationships, the same cannot be said for the international climate within which the future of that relationship must unfold. There is abroad, especially since the beginning of this decade, a growing uneasiness with the direction of international affairs, particularly the state of relations between the superpowers. Our people are concerned about the future and most of all about the prospect of war in a nuclear age.

Mr. Premier, we are faced with a daunting challenge. Either this generation of leaders must reduce the number of nuclear weapons and prevent their spread, or we bequeath to our children a future where the chances of global destruction increase every day. Yet it would be a dangerous fallacy to expect stability to be achieved only through numerical adjustments and technological containment, however significant.

It is at least equally important to bring about a fundamental change in attitudes and intentions if we are to assure the peace we all so desperately seek. Over the last few months I have sought to draw attention to the gravity of the present situation and to influence the trend of East-West relations. I have been voicing the concerns of a great many Canadians who are deeply troubled by uncertainty over superpower intentions and by fears of growing nuclear arsenals whose destructive potential already defies comprehension.

Premier Zhao, I have sought counsel with many statesmen and world leaders on these matters. You and I have discussed, both here and in Beijing, the role that political leadership must play in reducing international tensions. We live in a multipolar world and China is one of its essential compass points. We in Canada highly value the opinions of China on the urgent questions of international security. Your weight is undeniable in any global reckoning.

China must take its full place in the world community. China, as a permanent member of the Security Council, has responsibilities of leadership in the task of reducing the threat of nuclear war. Indeed, the United Nations Charter confers special rights and veto powers on the permanent members of the Security Council who, not incidentally, constitute the nuclear weapons fraternity. These rights and privileges in maintaining international security also confer special responsibilities. But, of course, the primary responsibility for nuclear disarmament lies with the superpowers. With nuclear arsenals which could threaten life on earth many times over, they have heavy responsibilities not only to each other but to all of us. We cannot wait until the United States and the Soviet Union however, pursuing some internal superpower logic, are ready to reach agreement. We must demonstrate our stake in their deliberations and force their attention to the threat to which they subject the rest of mankind.

All nations and all political leaders have the duty to do what they can to stop the nuclear arms race and to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. Thus we can take some satisfaction in the knowledge that, at a time when virtually all arms control negotiations have broken down, the foreign ministers of East and West are now gathering in Stockholm to discuss security and confidence-building measures in Europe. Let us hope that the period of megaphone diplomacy may be coming to an end.

Mr. Premier, the history of your country is measured in millenia. You know that on issues of war and peace there are no permanent solutions. Peace must be continuously constructed, nurtured and maintained through the efforts of honest men seeking happiness, prosperity and, in the nuclear age, the survival of their people. Thus, the quest for peace is never-ending. In this sense, our talks this morning and your presence in this Parliament, Premier Zhao, are important building blocks for peace. For do we not both represent men and women of goodwill?

His Excellency Zhao Ziyang (Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China):

Mr. Speaker of the Senate,

Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons,

Mr. Prime Minister,

The Honourable Members of Parliament,

I have come to visit your country at the kind invitation of Prime Minister Trudeau, bringing with me the deep friendship of the one billion Chinese people for the Canadian people. I feel greatly honoured to have this opportunity of speaking to this august gathering.

Contacts between the Chinese and Canadian peoples began over two hundred and fifty years ago. At that time, tens of thousands of Chinese came to Canada and joined the Canadian people in developing this country. Many Canadian friends also went to China to live and work there. When the Chinese people were in times of difficulty, Dr. Norman Bethune gave up his life for the Chinese people's cause of liberation. In October 1970, the People's Republic of China and Canada formally established diplomatic relations, thus ushering in a new stage in the friendship between our two peoples. Sino-Canadian friendship has since then developed steadily, contacts have increased, and exchanges and co-operation have expanded. Many Members of the Canadian Parliament and friends from all walks of life have worked unremittingly for and made valuable contributions to all this. Reviewing the past and looking into the future, we are fully confident of the bright prospects for the expansion of Sino-Canadian friendly relations and co-operation.

Now I would like to take this opportunity to speak about China's foreign policy and some related questions.

What is the fundamental principle of China's foreign policy? To answer this question briefly, it is independence. We do not attach ourselves to any big power and are not subject to any big power's will. We have determined our foreign policy in line with our judgment on international affairs formed according to the fundamental interests of the Chinese people and those of the world people.

It includes the following points: (1) to develop relations with all countries on the basis of the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence; (2) to strengthen solidarity with the other Third World countries and friendship with the people of all countries; and (3) to oppose hegemonism and safeguard world peace.

You all know that in modern history China was badly bullied and oppressed by foreign powers, and the Chinese people waged long and bitter struggles and ultimately won national independence at tremendous costs. Therefore, we are jealous of our own independence and at the same time highly respect the independence of other countries. Back in the early 1950s China initiated the Five Principles of mutual respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty, mutual non-aggression, non-interference in each other's internal affairs, equality and mutual benefit and peaceful co-existence, as norms guiding international relations. It is on these principles that we have handled our relations with other countries. We will never contravene these principles; nor do we want to see them violated by other countries in their mutual relations.

It is gratifying that the above-mentioned principles have been adhered to by both China and Canada in their mutual relations. The state of Sino-Canadian relations shows that countries with different social systems should and can live together in amity and co-operation to mutual benefit. We will work with Canada for the sustained development of our friendly relations and co-operation in the interest of the well-being of our peoples and the prosperity of our countries.

China is seeking to develop relations on the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence with all countries, which include the two superpowers—the United States and the Soviet Union. China has all along valued Sino-U.S. relations. The Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence are acknowledged as norms guiding Sino-U.S. relations in the 1979 communiqué on the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries. The United States recognizes that there is but one China, that the Government of the People's Republic of China is the sole legal Government of China and that Taiwan is a part of China. It has stated that it has no intention to infringe upon China's sovereignty and interfere in China's internal affairs.

Relations between China and the United States have made fairly big progress since the establishment of Sino-U.S. diplomatic relations. However, there have also been ups and downs, and twists and turns. The main obstacle is the question of Taiwan. During my visit to the United States I held friendly, candid and serious talks with President Reagan and other leaders of the U.S. Government. The American side once again affirmed the above principles. We hope that the two sides will work together, strictly abide by the mutually agreed principles in their action and truly fulfil commitments already made, so that Sino-U.S. relations may take the path of steady development.

We also sincerely wish to see normalization of Sino-Soviet relations. The present state of Sino-Soviet relations is not to the benefit of world peace. We are trying to maintain normal relations with the Soviet Union on the basis of the Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence. This requires the removal of the three obstacles to the normalization of Sino-Soviet relations: First, the Soviet Union must stop supporting Viet Nam in its aggression against Kampuchea; second, it must withdraw its troops from Afghanistan; and third, it must withdraw its forces from the Sino-Soviet border and Mongolia.

China and the Soviet Union have already held three rounds of consultations. However, the Soviet side has thus far evaded discussing these three questions which threaten China's security. Although Sino-Soviet relations have somewhat improved in recent years, greater efforts by the two sides are called for if Sino-Soviet relations are to be really normalized.

I also want to say a few words about Sino-British relations. Negotiations are going on between the two sides to resolve the Hong Kong question which is left over from history. Hong Kong was occupied by Britain after the opium war. China has decided to resume exercise of its sovereignty over Hong Kong in 1997. We have adopted the following policies which we believe are reasonable: Hong Kong will become a special administrative region of China to be administered by the Hong Kong people themselves; the current social and economic systems and lifestyle will remain unchanged; Hong Kong will maintain its financial independence and its status as a free port and international financial centre; Hong Kong will maintain and develop its economic and cultural relations with foreign countries; the interests of the residents and foreign investors in Hong Kong will be fully protected. Hong Kong's prosperity and stability will not be affected.

All these will be guaranteed by a basic law of Hong Kong to be enacted by the National People's Congress, the supreme organ of power in China, which will take into full account the opinions of people of all walks of life in Hong Kong. I believe the question of Hong Kong can be resolved through negotiations between China and Britain.

China is a developing socialist country. We share similar historical experiences and face the same task of economic development. We firmly support the other Third World countries in their just cause of safeguarding national independence and developing their national economies. We are in favour of increased South-South co-operation, improving North-South relations and establishing the new international economic order through global negotiations. The Chinese Government appreciates the efforts made by the Canadian Government for pushing North-South dialogue forward and improving North-South relations. China will persist in its policy of opening to the outside world, strengthen economic co-operation of equality and mutual benefit with both developing and developed countries, and do its part in promoting world economic prosperity. We hope Sino-Canadian economic co-operation may set an example of co-operation between developing and developed countries.

We believe that only when the principles of peaceful co-existence are universally respected can our planet enjoy genuine and lasting peace. Unfortunately, not every country is willing to observe these principles. Hegemonist acts of strong countries humiliating the weak, rich countries oppressing the poor and big countries bullying the small, keep occurring from time to time. Therefore, we firmly oppose hegemonism. We are against hegemonist actions no matter where and by whom they are committed. China will never seek hegemony. We have declared many times that if China ever pursues hegemonism, other countries should also take it to task. Without opposing hegemonism, international justice cannot possibly be upheld, nor world peace be maintained.

The present international situation is indeed disturbing. There are so-called "hot-spots" in many areas in the world. The nuclear arms race between the two superpowers is becoming white-hot. The struggle over the deployment of intermediate missiles has aggravated the situation in Europe where two military blocs confront each other. Under these circumstances the people of various countries strongly demand the stopping of the nuclear arms race and realizing disarmament. This is entirely justified. We appreciate the efforts made by Prime Minister Trudeau to safeguard world peace, relax international tension and promote nuclear disarmament. We support his appeal for the participation of more political leaders in the world in the cause of safeguarding world peace. We would like to continue consultations with Canadian leaders on these issues. We hope that all peace-loving countries and people will go into action and urge the two nuclear powers which possess over 90 per cent of the world's nuclear weapons to stop their nuclear arms race, resume disarmament talks, hold discussion in earnest and take the lead in agreeing on measures of drastically reducing nuclear arms so as to create the condition for joint nuclear disarmament by all the nuclear countries.

Honourable Members of Parliament, China takes the maintenance of world peace as a major objective in its foreign policy, not only because we need a peaceful international environment in which to modernize our country, but also because we are fully aware that the people of the world cannot afford to undergo the scourge of another world war. World peace and stability are the common desire of the people of all countries. So long as the people all over the world are united in defending peace, a new world war can be prevented.

I wish to take this opportunity to point out that a strong and prosperous China not only is in the interest of the Chinese people, but also contributes to world peace and stability. Now, more and more countries and regions hope to develop trade and economic co-operation with China and are highly interested in China's economic co-operation with China and are highly interested in China's economic policy. China's policy of opening to the outside world is not an expedient measure but a long-term national policy. While adhering to self-reliance, we also pay attention to importing advanced foreign technology and equipment and making use of foreign funds. In the next ten years we will give priority to energy, transportation, communication, and import key equipment and technology for upgrading about 400,000 enterprises. In all these areas, Canada has its strong points and experience. On our part, we also have many products which Canada needs. I am convinced, as time goes on, our areas of co-operation will become still more broader. Let us make further efforts to this end.

Honourable Members of Parliament, the Chairman of the Standing Committee of China's National People's Congress, Peng Zhen, has invited the Canadian Parliament to send a delegation to visit China at an appropriate time. I am sure you will be warmly welcomed by the Chinese National People's Congress, the Chinese Government and the Chinese people.

Thank you!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Riel (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Premier of the People's Republic of China, Mr. Prime Minister of Canada, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great honour to thank you, Mr. Premier of China, for the words of wisdom and encouragement you have just spoken before our two Houses of Parliament.

The philosophy that emerges from the outline you gave of your country's foreign policy and its peace objectives, your relations with the United States of America, with the Soviet Union, with Great Britain on the matter of Hong Kong, with Third World countries, and the North-South dialogue, seems very similar to what we in Canada believe, and in your comments on the policy and peace initiatives undertaken by our own Prime Minister, you expressed the same principles, and despite the immense distances that separate us, this is an example of the profoundly human solidarity that exists between our two peoples who are united in a common desire for peace.

Peace in our time, Mr. Premier, is not a vain ambition, and we are happy to hear that you share this ideal with our Prime Minister and with all Canadians, and you have come to us over the oceans, despite our cold Canadian winter, to announce before this Parliament that your people share our ideals. We find this very comforting, and urge you to tell the people of China that we are with them in this search for peace, and that Canadians are supporting the efforts of our Prime Minister, despite inevitable obstacles, to achieve a lasting peace at this point in the world's existence.

Thank you Mr. Premier for your visit and for the gesture you made today with reference to the cordial relations we have with China.

[English]

We wish to thank Your Excellency for your visit, for the gesture you have made and for the good words you have said to help the world along the road to peace. Thank you again.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Premier of China, Members of the Senate and the House of Commons, it is a great honour for me on behalf of Members of our Houses of Parliament and guests assembled to express our appreciation of the Address we have heard from the Premier of the People's Republic of China. We welcome him to Canada as a representative of the most populous nation on earth and also as a friend.

The establishment of diplomatic ties between our two countries in 1970 was an important step leading to the resumption by China of its prominent role in the international community. Since that time there have been, as has been mentioned, an increasing number of exchanges between Canada and the People's Republic in the fields of arts and culture, science and technology, education, medicine, sports, tourism and, of course in economic areas. Canada's exports of well over $1 billion annually testify to the value of China as a trading partner.

In addition to continued economic co-operation we are encouraged by China's support for efforts to bring lasting international peace and stability.

[Translation]

Last year, a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians went to China to increase our knowledge of each other's country, to consolidate our friendship and to explore other avenues for co-operation between our two countries. All members of the delegation were absolutely delighted with their visit.

[English]

In keeping with the warm relationship which has developed between our two countries, we are honoured to receive our distinguished visitor in our capital.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The meeting is now adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), for Hon. A. I. Barrow, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, January 17, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Monday, January 16, 1984, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. BARROW
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Charles McElman moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

THIRD REPORT PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. William J. Petten, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

THIRD REPORT

Pursuant to rule 66(1)(b), your committee submits herewith the list of senators nominated by it to serve on the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence.

The Honourable Senators Buckwold, Charbonneau, *Flynn (or Roblin), Hicks, Kelly, Lafond, Langlois, Lapointe, Marshall, McElman, Molgat, Molson, *Olson (or Frith), Yuzyk.

*Ex Officio Members

Respectfully submitted

WILLIAM J. PETTEN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, may I offer an observation? A complication has arisen in the past few moments. It is this: When the rules were amended to reduce the membership of select committees and standing committees to 12 it was specified under the heading of each committee that the quorum be four. Provision was not made for new special committees to have a quorum of four and because the old rule 70 has been eliminated, we are faced with a situation this afternoon that, for organization purposes, this special committee will require a quorum of eight, which may be difficult to obtain from the number of senators present in the chamber who are members of that committee. I do not know whether there is a solution but I put the problem to the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether the term "select committees" would include both standing committees and special committees. The only solutions I see are to either postpone the organizational meeting this afternoon or attempt to get a quorum of eight members. Regrettably, I do not see that we can do much about the matter right now, except to seek an answer in the rules.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH COUNTRIES OF THE MIDDLE EAST AND NORTH AFRICA

Hon. George van Roggen, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon Canadian relations with countries of the Middle East and North Africa.

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of traveling and living expenses, if required, in such amount as the committee may determine; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject during the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament be referred to the committee.

Motion agreed to.

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE INSTRUCTED TO MAKE STUDY

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the first session of the present Parliament be referred to the committee.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL VICTORIA HOSPITAL, MONTREAL—NEUROLOGICAL EXPERIMENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government, but I have the impression he will take this question as notice, since it includes several requests for information.

It has been reported that during the sixties some disturbing events took place in the Department of Neurology at the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal. We are told that a number of neurological experiments similar to brainwashing were carried out, in co-operation with the CIA, and that people who underwent those treatments have since suffered very serious after-effects. On one television program, a former patient referred publicly to the treatments she received during her stay at the Royal Victoria in the sixties, when apparently the CIA was conducting an experimental program with the Chief Neurologist, Dr. Cameron.

Subsequently, we heard that the Canadian Government had received apologies from the American Government for the CIA's activities during those years. However, it seems the victims who underwent the neurological treatments supervised by CIA experts are suing the American Government and the CIA, and that lawyers for the victims seem to be having trouble obtaining important documents which they claim exist and which they are seeking to obtain from the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to support their claims against the U.S. Government and the CIA.

The woman who told her story on television said that lawyers were having an extremely difficult time getting the co-operation of the Department of External Affairs on this important case, a case that is, I would say, very disturbing for Canadians in general, when there is evidence that an American information agency infiltrated our hospitals to carry out experiments of this kind.

I would like to know whether the Acting Leader of the Government could find out from the Department of External Affairs whether there are any documents that might be of some help to the victims of these treatments. If so, would the Department be willing to co-operate with the victims' lawyers in establishing a sound basis for their claims.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have asked for a preliminary report on this matter. In fact, I just received it a few minutes ago and that is why I only have the English version. I can translate if you prefer.

Senator Asselin: Fine; go ahead in English.

[English]

Senator Frith: In August 1977 the Department of External Affairs learned for the first time, through a press report, that the CIA had financed, through a private U.S. foundation, the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology, medical experiments at the Allan Memorial Institute of McGill University.

Since 1977 the Canadian government has made representations on numerous occasions to the United States government regarding these experiments performed in Canada, as mentioned by Senator Asselin, without the patients' consent and without the knowledge of the Canadian government. The CIA has acknowledged that it sponsored this research without the knowledge of the Canadian government. The United States authorities have expressed deep regret concerning this matter and have assured us that pursuant to a presidential executive order of 1978 such a thing will never happen again. It would appear that this apology was conveyed orally to senior Canadian officials. A search of departmental files has not yet turned up such a letter.

A number of individuals who were exposed to the experiments have sued the U.S. government in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia seeking compensation for their injuries. The department has been trying to assist them in obtaining documents which would elucidate the facts at issue in the lawsuit.

In August 1983, the Canadian ambassador raised the matter with the State Department in order to express concern and to indicate our interest in an early resolution of this issue. The department will be intensifying its efforts in the near future with a view to assisting Canadians, who may have been harmed by the experiments, to obtain compensation from the U.S. government.

Honourable senators, that is the government's position; it means to do precisely what Senator Asselin has asked.

[Translation]

If Senator Asselin would like specific details, I promise to do what I can.

Senator Asselin: I want to thank Senator Frith for acting so quickly to get this information. I suppose that when he heard about the case, he probably felt it was so serious that he had to get the information immediately, and he is to be congratulated for having done so.

The fact remains that the honourable senator's reply contains a number of facts that are disturbing for Canadians. I don't think we have ever seen a foreign country make such a major intrusion in a field as personal as neurology, as the United States has done in Canada, without notifying the Canadian Government.

Has the CIA infiltrated areas other than the one mentioned in the course of our discussion? It is quite possible.

I do feel that we should obtain more assurances from the United States Government. We should find out whether there has been infiltration by the CIA in other areas in Canada, without the approval of the Canadian Government, to carry out other experiments.

I want to take a serious look at all the angles of this problem. Later on I may be asking my honourable friend whether it would be possible to refer this entire question to our Foreign Affairs Committee so that we can hear witnesses from the Department of External Affairs as well. If I understood your report correctly, officials of the Department of External Affairs had been informed orally at the time or after when it happened.

I think we will have to dig deeper into this matter. It is a matter of national sovereignty to prevent a foreign country from infiltrating a field as important as the field of medicine. I think we may have to go even farther than my honourable friend and submit the entire question to a parliamentary committee, which would, I think, be able to clarify the situation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Asselin and his principles with respect to this kind of interference.

However, we must not forget that in this particular case, the initiative was taken by a private company in the United States, without the knowledge of the Government. We must, as I think Senator Asselin pointed out, understand exactly what the Government's role was.

If I correctly understood the information I received on the oral aspect, there was a statement by the United States in reply to Canada. We expressed our objections with respect to the situation and we asked them: "When did you extend your apologies?" and then they answered: "We did so orally". The Canadian government was not informed. The United States government was unable to find out whether it had been done in writing.

In any case, that is the position for the time being. I shall, of course, forward a transcript of our proceedings to the Department of External Affairs to emphasize the fact that we wish to express our support for the Government's efforts in helping the lawyers, as Senator Asselin suggested, and also to be kept informed of any developments in this very important case.

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government respecting the Auditor General and the Canada Ports Corporation.

I can preface my remarks by saying that the Canada Ports Corporation is the successor to the National Harbours Board. According to the Auditor General, he has been the auditor of the National Harbours Board for the past 48 years, and indeed, according to him, this is the first of many major crown corporations to which the Auditor General has not been appointed as auditor or joint auditor. The information that has appeared indicates that the Auditor General of Canada will no longer be requested by the government to audit the books of the Canada Ports Corporation.

I have a couple of questions on that. First, what is the reason for the change? Secondly, was the Auditor General consulted on the matter before that decision was taken?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I saw the same news item in the press. I shall attempt to obtain an answer to both questions for Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: There are some other points that ought to be clarified. The first has to do with whether or not this represents a new policy initiative on the part of the government, because the Canada Ports Corporation is not the only major crown corporation included in the Financial Administration Act heretofore audited by the Auditor General. That act also includes the Canada Post Corporation, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the National Capital Commission and others.

I should like to know why the Canada Ports Corporation has apparently been singled out for special treatment. Or, if that is not the case, has the government indeed decided to dispense with the services of the Auditor General—who, alone among auditors, reports to Parliament and keeps Parliament informed of what is going on—thereby adopting a new policy of contracting this work out? That is an important policy question that needs to be settled.

There is another point my honourable friend could look into for me, if he would be so kind, and that is to obtain information so that he can inform the Senate on the terms of reference of the new auditor. If, indeed, the government intends to ditch the Auditor General with respect to the Canada Ports Corporation and appoint somebody else, what are the terms of reference of the new auditor?

I make that request because, as everyone knows, the terms of reference of the Auditor General are not the same as those given to ordinary, commercial auditors. The terms of reference are broader for the Auditor General of Canada so that Parliament can be kept informed. I think it important for us to know whether the terms of reference for the new auditor will be the same as those that were in place for the Auditor General; and, if not, what the difference is.

I should also like to know whether the government will reconsider its decision in order to reinstate the Auditor General of Canada in a job which he has done quite satisfactorily for 48 long years.

Senator Frith: I will certainly treat that as a supplementary question, and I am sure that the government, having taken this decision with reference to the Canada Ports Corporation, will be happy to give its reasons. As soon as I have the information I will provide it. We can then see if we wish to discuss the matter further, because it is a matter of broad principle.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his cooperation. Perhaps he could also inform the Senate why it was desirable to bestow this gift on a gentleman who lives in Winnipeg, which is a long way from most ports. Winnipeg is a long 650 miles from the Port of Churchill, though I do not know whether the new auditor will go there very often, but most of Canada's ports are located in places other than the centre of the country. It would be interesting to know why this assignment has been given to a certain gentleman, in his personal capacity, as far as one can tell. If that is not the case, then I think the acting leader should tell us what the facts are. On the face of it, it is a curious situation and I hope that my curiosity can be satisfied.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I listened with interest to what the Acting Leader of the Opposition had to say. I heard him say, or understood him to say, that most of the ports of Canada are to be found in central Canada. I recommended to him that he think about the Port of Halifax, which is on the edge of Canada. The acting leader said, "in the centre of Canada." The ports of Canada are generally located on the outskirts; at least, the port I am proud to represent is on the outskirts of Canada.

Senator Frith: I may have misunderstood my honourable friend, but I think that if he said anything that indicated the ports of Canada are normally found in Winnipeg, he said so ironically; but, in fact, I thought he said quite the opposite.

Senator Donahoe: I did not understand him to say that the ports were found in Winnipeg; I understood him to say that most of the ports are to be found in the centre of the country. If I am wrong, I apologize. Today's Hansard will prove who is correct.

Senator Roblin: Fortunately, I have a chance to correct today's Hansard before my honourable friend can see it, but if he is right, then I am wrong, because the ports of Canada are not found in the centre of the country but are found in other locations. I accept that correction and will look at Hansard carefully to make sure that no false impression is left.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

SUBSIDIES TO FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question relating to the draft regulations Canada Post Corporation intends to circulate for consultation with respect to the subsidies the Post Office provides for foreign publications.

In its news release of January 6, the Canada Post Corporation said that these draft regulations would be circulated. I regret that I have not received my copy. If they have not been circulated, I would appreciate my honourable friend's letting me have a copy of them.

My question has to do with subsidies to foreign publications. Indeed, perhaps the government could provide answers to a couple of questions. I believe there are two classes of subsidy—those for foreign publications mailed inside Canada, and those for foreign publications actually printed in Canada. I should like to know the policy of the government with respect to these subsidies. If they are being terminated, can my honourable friend tell me on what grounds?

In addition, I should like to know what the subsidies amount to and who gets them. In order to consider carefully, as the Post Office would like us to do, the impact of these proposed regulations, whenever we see them, I would appreciate having some facts on the present situation so that we can decide whether the government's policy is in the best interests of the taxpayers and of the cultural life of the nation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure the government would welcome that sort of examination, and I agree with Senator Roblin that to begin with we should try to get the regulations.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government, which, although it is rather parochial in nature, I am sure he will have to take as notice. It concerns the meeting between the Minister of Transportation of Newfoundland and the federal Minister of Transport. The Province of Newfoundland is concerned because of the deterioration of the Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland.

Could the acting leader impress upon the Minister of Transport the importance of upgrading and maintaining the Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland and giving it priority among the public projects of that province? Could he obtain an answer as to the position the minister is taking with regard to advancing the necessary funding or, indeed, to renewing the agreements with the Province of Newfoundland on highway construction and providing the funding for that project?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, without making this a supplementary, I wonder if the acting leader could indicate to us if he has made a New Year's resolution that delayed answers will be given to the Senate much quicker than they were last year?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would rather avoid the comparison, but I have made a resolution—and I have spoken to my assistant and Senator Olson's assistant in this respect—to try to answer those questions even more satisfactorily than last year, if that is possible.

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVES

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on January 16, 1984 as a continuation of a question he asked on December 20, 1983, concerning the Prime Minister's peace initiatives.

I have a copy of the address made yesterday by the Honourable Allan MacEachen in Stockholm at the 36 Nation Conference on Confidence Measures and Disarmament in Europe.

Perhaps I could cite some of his speech in response to Senator Asselin's question; it might then be useful to incorporate the entire contents of the speech as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate; but I leave that to Senator Asselin. Particularly dealing with the question of how ongoing these initiatives might be, I will refer to page 5 of that address. Our minister made the following statement:

Let us, as Ministers, commit ourselves here and now to investing this enterprise with a sense of political direction and urgency, and if it proves desirable for us to return to this forum to re-inspire and maintain that momentum, is there any among us who would not come back, who would assign a higher priority to other engagements?

Let us begin to negotiate.

Let us concentrate on the realistic goals defined by the mandate for this conference of confidence-building—and not on the enormity of some of the gaps that must ultimately be faced in our search for a less dangerous world.

A less dangerous world: I am convinced that that is what we all want—regardless of our political system, our geographical size, our armed might.

We are all in this together, superpower and mini-state. We move forward together, or we sink back into greater and greater danger.

I come back again and again to the urgency of our confidence-building task.

Never have imagination and determination been more urgently called for.

The Government of Canada commits itself now, as it has done in the past, to responding unstintingly to this challenge.

Honourable senators who attended the joint meeting and the joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons on Tuesday will have noted that the Prime Minister made some comments about the need to continue the initiatives; in that way, he addressed some of the questions Senator Asselin raised both before Christmas and earlier this week. I expect that Senator Asselin may want some further precisions, particularly as a result of developments announced in the news today regarding the response of Mr. Andropov that he would be unable to see the Prime Minister now, apparently because of ill health. Certainly, if Senator Asselin wants such further, specific information about the future activity of the peace mission, I will try to get that for him.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I want to direct this question to my honourable colleague. Now that a letter from Mr. Andropov has been received in which he is asking the Prime Minister to delay his trip to Moscow, will the Prime Minister put off his peace mission for a few months or a few weeks? What are his plans?

Senator Frith: I sought information as you were asking the question. A release will be issued today concerning specific details on the initiative of the Prime Minister. This announcement is right along the line of the question asked by Senator Asselin. Unfortunately, I cannot provide more details right now, but I hope to be able to do so before the Senate adjourns.

Senator Asselin: I would like to have those details before the adjournment, for we will not be here next week and this subject is of considerable interest to me.

Senator Frith: I will indeed convey this information to you if possible.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

PRIVATE BILLS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY FOR JANUARY 24, 1984

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, unfortunately, I have not had an opportunity to discuss this matter with Senator Leblanc, but it is my understanding that he will be prepared to proceed with the four private bills on January 31. As Senator Asselin pointed out, they had been adjourned to January 24, but putting them over until January 31 will give honourable senators opposite an opportunity to consider these bills and to prepare and form replies for second reading, as Senator Asselin has requested.

Since he knows more about these private bills than I do, perhaps Senator Leblanc has something to add.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: I am unable to introduce Bills S-2, S-3, S-4 and S-5 today. Additional research, which is required to complete certain records, will only be ready next week. The Acting Leader of the Government believes that all the papers will be ready when we come back on January 31; however, I cannot confirm this statement as the compilation of that material is outside of my jurisdiction.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I am not insisting that you table your documents on January 31, because I shall be pleading a case before the Appeals Court in Quebec City on that day. If it is convenient, I would prefer to hear your views on these bills on the following Wednesday or Thursday.

Senator Leblanc: If the material is ready, I can foresee no problem, Senator Asselin.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with reference to the absence from the chamber today of Senator Austin and Senator Argue, I have this information.

Senator Austin spoke to me—and I apologize for not having mentioned this earlier—about a cabinet meeting that had been planned for this morning, and, of course, our own morning sitting today was not anticipated. That is why he is unable to be with us today.

Senator Argue, on January 17, 18 and 19—which is today—is hosting Mr. Boris S. Gordeev, Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade for the Soviet Union, on his visit to Canada. That is the reason for his absence.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Charles McElman moved the third reading of Bill C-2, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—QUORUM

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been asked to try to solve Senator Lafond's problem with respect to the organization meeting of the Special Senate Committee on National Defence. If Senator Lafond is correct—I have not had a chance to check, but he probably is—it is likely, just because of an anomaly in the rules, that his committee requires an eight-member quorum while all other Senate committees require only a four-member quorum. Perhaps we could do Senator Lafond the courtesy of putting his committee on a par with the other Senate committees.

If honourable senators unanimously agree, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That the quorum of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence be four members.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

SENATE REFORM

REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report from the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Reform of the Senate of Canada. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

This is the normal motion when a report is introduced. There have been occasions in the past when there have been requests for such a report to be appended to the Debates of the Senate. I know this involves a certain cost and that the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee has considered this matter in the past and has asked questions with respect to the need for this extra printing. Since the report deals with this institution I would ask for the views of my colleagues in the Senate with respect to whether or not we should add to the motion the words "and the Debates of the Senate."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I gather that my honourable friend has invited us on this side of the house to comment on his suggestion. I think we agree it is a good idea. This is a report which goes to the very heart of our operation in the Senate, and if adopted and implemented by all concerned it will have a very important effect on the constitutional and parliamentary life of the country. It seems to me it is not out of the way to have the report printed in both publications, as my honourable friend suggests. The report itself is some 120 pages long, inclusive of the English and the French texts, and although the printing of that number of pages will run up a considerable bill the fact that it is already in both official languages facilitates its printing in our records. I support my honourable friend's suggestion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had the opportunity to discuss Senator Molgat's suggestion with him and Senator Roblin before the proceedings commenced this afternoon. I agree with the remarks of both my colleagues. Although we should be careful with respect to running up the cost of the printing in the Minutes and Debates, I think that this is an exceptional situation and the suggestion is one which I support.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Motion agreed to.

For text of report see appendix, p. 128.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(e), I move that the report be taken into consideration now. If that is agreeable to honourable senators, I will outline the major points of the report today and will make more substantial comments at a later date.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, as a rule I am one of those who need to be convinced that leave must be justified in order to breach our rules. The general theory is that it is appropriate that we have a period of 48 hours, as the rules provide, to read the report and make ourselves familiar with it before debate begins. We have only received the report on our desks this very minute. I understand that in this particular case, as the mover has said, the purpose of his speech will be to give factual information as opposed to debating the details of the report. I think there is considerable interest in the general public with respect to the contents of this report. Therefore, it might be useful for the joint chairman to outline some of the contents of the report now. In this way we can reserve the opportunity to talk about what we like and what we do not like in the report for some other time. I do not oppose the request for leave.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think we should support the request for leave in this case. I understand that the joint chairman intends to make introductory comments with respect to the report. I am sure his comments will aid us all in reading the document and in debating it later on.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, by this time you will have received a copy of the report together with a copy of the press communiqué. The report represents eight months of solid work on the part of the committee members. As you will recall, the committee as structured was made up of eight senators and ten members of the House of Commons. At the first meeting, the committee very kindly elected me as one of the joint chairmen and the Honourable Roy MacLaren was elected as the joint chairman representing the House of Commons. Later, however, Mr. MacLaren became a cabinet minister and at that time the Honourable Paul Cosgrove became the joint chairman representing the House of Commons.

Throughout the work of the committee there was an agreeable understanding between the two houses. As you know, joint committees are not always easy committees to work with, but I must say that this was one of the finest committees with which I have had the privilege of working. We did not always agree, but we certainly agreed to work together to try to reach the best possible solution to the problem that had been presented to us.

I want to pay particular tribute to my colleagues in the Senate who worked on this committee. Senate representation on the committee was eight senators but, in fact, a total of 24 senators worked on the committee at some stage or other. In other words, there were 16 additional senators who worked on the committee during the course of the deliberations and meetings that were held across Canada.

I would like to convey my particular thanks as well to the staff members who worked with us. You will find them listed on page 61 of the report. The clerks from both houses did outstanding work. My own personal staff was invaluable in giving their assistance, and the research group worked extremely well together—and I say “together” because we attempted to do something a little different from that done by some previous committees. On one side, as the project directors, we had the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade, with which many of you have worked previously; on the other side, we had staff from the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament seconded to that group. It all worked out exceedingly well, and they have my thanks and sincere appreciation.

Turning now to the report itself, it might be useful to refresh our memories as to the terms of reference passed by the two houses. You will recall that it was this house that passed the resolution in the first instance, and the part of that order of reference which is of importance to us is that in which we were instructed:

—to consider and report upon ways by which the Senate of Canada could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country;

That the Committee include in its final report recommendations concerning the method of selection, powers, length of term for Senators, distribution of seats and other matters that the Committee considers relevant to the reform of the Senate;

Thus, our clear guideline was to take a good look at the regional representation function of the Senate, and this is what we attempted to do during the course of our work in the committee. We recognized at the outset that, before any major changes could be made to the Senate which would require constitutional amendment, there had to be agreement by at least seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population. We recognized, therefore, the importance of provincial input and provincial understanding.

Our first course of action was to write to all of the provincial premiers to invite them to meet with us as they chose, by appearing before the committee during public hearings, appearing before the committee in camera or meeting with us on a private basis. We invited representatives of all political parties in Canada to do the same.

We decided that the committee would travel to the provincial and territorial capitals so that members of the provincial and territorial legislatures would not have to travel to Ottawa to give their views to the committee. The committee travelled to the capital cities of the ten provinces and to the two capital cities located in the territories. The committee held as many hearings as necessary so that everyone wishing to submit their views was heard.

During the course of the hearings there was no attempt to direct the committee or to guide the committee in any particular direction. We listened to the viewpoints that were put before us and discussed them among ourselves, but did not attempt to arrive at a consensus at that point. It was only after we had finished our hearings that the committee members got together for two days in an attempt to make some sense out of the diverse points of view we had heard over a period of some months. I think I can honestly say that many of us changed our minds during the course of the hearings as we listened to the various points of view. When we sat down and discussed those among ourselves, I think I can honestly say that we all came to the conclusion that major reforms were necessary.

At the outset there was not total agreement on the way in which the Senate should be reformed, but a consensus was worked out and at that time we started to put our thoughts down on paper.

The report of the committee is really a composite of many points of view: those given by members of the House of Commons and of the Senate who were invited to speak to us; those given by academics; those given by members of the various provincial legislatures; and those given by ordinary citizens who felt they wanted to speak to us. The structure of the committee was such that all parties represented in the two federal houses of Parliament were represented on the committee. This meant that there was a great background of political knowledge available. There was, indeed, a very broad input because so many members of the committee had served on municipal councils as well as in provincial governments.

As a result of holding those hearings across the country, the committee produced a report. The report is very different from propositions that have previously been made regarding Senate reform. The report is an attempt by the members of the committee to put in place a system that will work to provide the regional input we were instructed to look at, and which, quite frankly, we found in the course of our travels, Canadians wanted. Canadians are looking for a forum such as the Senate to reflect truly Canada and its regional, ethnic and economic differences. The feeling is that that job is not being done adequately at the present time by the Senate in spite of the mandate given to it by the Fathers of Confederation when they established the Senate. The feeling of the Canadian people is that the Senate does not accomplish that job properly. There is general recognition that we do excellent work in committees; that we do excellent work in reviewing legislation; that we do excellent work when we make a study of a special subject. There is equal disappointment that we do not properly reflect and stand up for the regional interests in this country. So, in my opinion, there is in the Canadian people a desire to see a new chamber, a chamber better able to do that job.

Out of all of that comes this report, and I must repeat—as we do in the report, as we do in our communiqué, and as we will be doing in speeches we will make across the country—that this is an inter-dependent report. You can analyze it and criticize every section of it, but no section stands by itself, no proposal stands by itself. In our opinion, they stand as a whole and they must be looked at in that way. Therefore, we urge you to read the whole of the report before drawing conclusions. Do not come to any conclusions after simply reading the first two, three, or four propositions. Do not even make any notes in the margins as you are reading it, but go through it first in its totality. Look at the whole thing as a package before drawing any definite conclusions. In my opinion, that is the only way in which this report can be intelligently considered. If following this procedure takes a little time, then so be it. Let us take the time to look at it in its entirety as a series of accommodations which we hope will provide the right combination of sufficient power and sufficient regional representation without destroying the parliamentary system we have in this country.

In essence, we recommend an elected Senate, not on the basis of proportional representation, as has been frequently proposed both in this house and outside it, but rather by direct election on a single constituency basis. The argument over proportional representation will continue, I am sure, and there was much discussion about it in our group. The feeling was that proportional representation would not provide that degree of independence that we think is essential to a Senate that will speak out boldly for regional views and not be unduly subjected to party pressure, recognizing that parties are, nevertheless, an essential part of the parliamentary system.

We recommend a substantial change in the distribution of seats. The equalization across the country would move, basically, to 12 senators per province. However, the two central provinces, Quebec and Ontario, because of population size, economic considerations, historical elements and practical considerations, would remain at 24 seats each. The other provinces would have 12 seats with the exception of Prince Edward Island, which would have 6 seats, while the Northwest Territories would have 4 seats and the Yukon Territory would have 2 seats. Although that distribution of seats does not represent total equality, it would be a substantial move forward which we think could be acceptable.

We recommend that there be a suspensive veto and not a full veto as we now have.

We recommend that action be taken to provide for the independence of senators vis-à-vis the House of Commons and vis-à-vis the government by having elections based on single member constituencies that would be for a limited non-renewable term. We recommend that the term be nine years in order that it will be sufficiently long to provide for those senators who are already appointed, and that it be non-renewable so that those who are here will have independence. That would also eliminate competition with the House of Commons with respect to what you might call the ombudsman work in the constituencies, and would leave honourable senators with more time to concentrate on those things that we consider to be the responsibilities of the Senate. In other words, senators will be able to do the work now being done in committees and in special studies, without being subject to the same pressures as members of the House of Commons and without being in direct competition with them at all times.

We recommend that elections be held every three years on fixed dates, so as not to coincide with elections for the House of Commons. Thus, Senate elections would not become embroiled in questions of confidence in the House of Commons or of the choice of Prime Minister. Ours would be elections purely of those responsible for regional representation.

We also recommend that members of this house, elected in this fashion, be ineligible for cabinet posts. We recognize that some feel that a purpose of this house should, in a certain way, be to provide members of cabinet, where the party in power has been unsuccessful in having a member for a particular region elected to the House of Commons. It is our view that to follow that course would take the political parties off the hook; that, if political parties cannot elect members in certain regions of the country, then the political parties ought to be looking at themselves; that the fault lies in the political parties and not in the political institutions of this country; and that we should not change the institutions to suit that purpose. Let the parties do their proper work; they have a role in that regard.

We recommend that there be a double majority regarding francophone language rights. We have to recognize that as we have changed the make-up of the Senate through the years we have been diluting the input of the province of Quebec, which started off with a one-third membership in this Senate at the time of Confederation, when each region had 24 seats. That dilution has been ongoing. We are, quite frankly, now recommending further dilution. We think on that basis—considering that, when it entered Confederation as Lower Canada, the Province of Quebec insisted that there be Senate representation of regional and minority rights—the double majority mechanism will give that protection at this time.

Those are the major general recommendations we make. I hope I have not missed any in my comments.

Honourable senators, I come back to the point I made earlier: I urge you to look at the whole report, from the first chapter to the last, before reaching a conclusion on whether it can work. While we did not have unanimity in our committee, we had a large degree of consensus. Accordingly, we have tried to indicate in the report the varying points of view.

Finally, we are quite conscious of the present nature and stature of this house, but we believe the recommendations we make can be carried out during a transitional period, and we deal with that matter in chapter 7 of our report. One member of the committee felt that that was as far as we should go in our recommendations at this time; that any of the proposals that we make for change now that can be made by this house itself, or by the two houses, without constitutional change, would fit into a future plan for an elected Senate. That is not, however, the wish of most of the members of the committee; the majority wish to move to an elected Senate as quickly as possible. However, we recognize the constitutional difficulties.

Nevertheless, some changes can and should be made now. We recognize that the senators who are here came to this chamber under a certain set of conditions, and we recognize that the country, in asking them to come here, accepted those conditions, as did the senators themselves. We recommend that those conditions be lived up to, but that we should not wait to make changes within this house.

Honourable senators, the need for reform is urgent and I think that all of the members of the committee will agree that, as we travelled across the country, Canadians stated in direct terms that they want to see some major changes made to this institution.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

AFFAIRS OF THE AGED

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF DIVISION—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, February 7, 1984, I will move:

[Senator Molgat.]

That in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the establishment of a Division of the Affairs of the Aged, with responsibility, insofar as the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, for promoting the welfare of aged people in Canada by

- (i) planning and helping to plan Government of Canada policies on the affairs of the aged, in particular, in the areas of human rights, income security, employment, retirement and public services, including housing, nutrition, health care, education and recreation;
- (ii) administering such Acts of the Parliament of Canada and such orders and regulations of the Government of Canada as are assigned to it;
- (iii) co-ordinating policies, in both the public and private sectors, affecting the aged;
- (iv) carrying out research and dispensing information on the affairs of the aged; and
- (v) engaging in such other activities as are considered conducive to this goal by the Governor in Council.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—PROPOSED REVIEW—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Thursday, February 2, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to review the recommendations contained in the Fifth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, entitled: "Marching to the Beat of the Same Drum: Transportation of Petroleum and Natural Gas North of 60°", tabled in the Senate on 30th March, 1983, and to enquire into any matter related thereto;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of consideration of legislation and other matters as may be referred to it.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—PROPOSED AUTHORIZATION—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Thursday, February 2, 1984, Senator Sparrow will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to hear submissions from representatives of agricultural, fisheries, forestry and related industries.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, February 2, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it has been our practice to sit on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, leaving Wednesday afternoons free for committee meetings and Wednesday mornings free for caucus. The intention is to continue that procedure for the month of February. However, I would ask honourable senators to take notice of the winter break that, by the rules of the other place, is provided for in February. We are, of course, not bound by those rules, but it is quite likely that we will not sit during the period of that winter break. We shall certainly not sit, if there is not a heavy list of legislation from the other place. The date of that break, as proposed in the other place, is from Saturday, February 25 until Wednesday, February 29. Therefore, we shall probably adjourn on Thursday, February 23 and resume on March 6. I am not giving a Notice of Motion but I am advising senators that we shall have a break from our proceedings commencing the week of Monday, February 27. The winter break proposed by the House of Commons will continue until March 5 and we shall probably return on Tuesday, March 6.

● (1440)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to debate the motion, because I believe we are ready to approve it. However, I should like to make a request of the Acting Leader of the Government with respect to the proposed winter break. In mentioning it this afternoon, he left me with the distinct impression that we might meet during that break if we received sufficient work from the other place to necessitate that. There could be a difficult situation, because many senators would like to know definitely what our timetable is likely to be. If it is necessary for us to return during the break, then we shall be here; there is no question about that. But perhaps the Acting Leader of the Government could confirm at the earliest possible time whether or not we shall be meeting during the break, in order that those senators who wish to make plans may do so.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am prepared to say now that it is not our intention to sit during that week. It would have to be an emergency of some kind that would require our sitting during that week. Subject to the usual caveat regarding the necessity for us to sit in the event of an emergency, honourable senators may make their plans on the basis of our not sitting that week. We would adjourn on the Thursday, although the other place would not adjourn until the following day, Friday.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government concerning veterans affairs. As a result of the indexing of pensions, the January increase in the basic rate of pension for veterans means that once again veterans will receive a lower rate of pension than those in the Public Service who work in the lowest categories on which the basic rate of pension is based. Veterans will fall behind by the amount of $596 per year.

There have been many requests made to overcome this periodic variation against veterans and the minister is well aware of the situation. The average age of First World War veterans is over 83. Is it not time that steps were taken to overcome this inequity? Will the Acting Leader of the Government impress upon the minister concerned the need to correct this anomaly?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will bring to the attention of the responsible minister the renewed concern of the honourable senator for this recurring problem, and I hope to have a reply at the earliest opportunity.

DECEASED VETERANS—WIDOWS' PENSIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, notwithstanding the fact that Canadian veterans legislation is as good as and is comparable with any in the world—and is probably even better, a serious anomaly still exists concerning the proportionate pension of a widow of a deceased veteran. A widow of a veteran who was receiving a 60 per cent pension receives the same amount as the widow of a veteran who was receiving a 100 per cent pension. In the Senate committee's report "They Served—We Care," this matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It is a serious anomaly, because such widows have for many years looked after their husbands who have suffered from war wounds. Perhaps the Acting Leader of the Government would request the minister again to give consideration to this matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe I am correct in recalling that this is not the first time that the honourable senator has raised this point. I will try to obtain from the minister a reply to his question.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

TORONTO MEETING—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF
EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government. On the weekend of January 22, the Ontario branch of the Liberal Party held a soul-searching session in Toronto, at which the Minister of Employment and Immigration is widely reported as having advised the delegates that:

We have now developed such an extraordinary elaboration of commissions and structures and consultations that we have at best a stultification and, perhaps at worst, an ossification of the processes of decisions in government.

It is also reported that the Acting Leader of the Government was present at that retreat. Did he object to that statement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration or does he support it?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was present at that meeting, and, as the honourable senator knows, the Liberal Party, unlike some other Canadian political parties, is a party of reform. I am sure the honourable senator rejoices with me in knowing that reform is alive and well in the Liberal Party and that at every meeting we discuss reform as an ongoing policy of the Liberal Party. Although we have made great strides, we are never satisfied and we always try to do better.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: That is a good non-political answer.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the reply of the Acting Leader of the Government convinces me that the ossification has spread further down the line than ever. I would ask the acting leader if, in view of the statement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the obvious support of the Acting Leader of the Government, we can now expect a reduction in the number of consultants employed by the various departments and the abolition of the Macdonald Commission on the Economy?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are two parts to the question. First, the honourable senator's comment convinces me that, in terms of ossification of the other side, nothing has changed; secondly, I should explain that I attended all of the sessions, including the one addressed by the minister. He may have made those statements, but he did not make them to the meeting. No decisions were taken and there was no opportunity for those present to respond to the alleged comments. Regarding the honourable senator's expectation concerning commissions and consultants to the government, I assume that the government will continue its policy of obtaining the best brains available in the country at the best possible price to assist it in governing the country.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in view of the Acting Leader of the Government's statement that the government was desirous of obtaining the best brains in the country, if the acting leader would take a look at the opposition in the other place, he would realize that most of the talent is there.

Senator Frith: Don't call us, we'll call you.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board concerning the Western Grain Stabilization Act. As my honourable friend is aware, no payments have been made under that act for some time, even though the farmers are continuing to contribute as is the federal government. Moreover, there is general uneasiness when the operation of that statute is compared with the other support statutes. In eastern Canada, over the past year, money has actually been paid out to winter wheat producers, whereas that has not been possible in the west. I know the minister shares this dissatisfaction with the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Is he able to give any report to this chamber as to when we may expect to see some proposed changes in that statute?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I anticipate that, as announced in the Speech from the Throne, the proposed changes will appear in this session in the form of a bill, and I hope that bill will be passed. The precise nature of the changes that will be recommended is being carefully studied at ongoing meetings on the subject.

Senator Roblin: Naturally, I would like the minister to give us some details of what he has in mind, but I do not suppose he feels inclined to respond to that request this afternoon. No doubt he is aware that the Canada Grains Council has designed what it calls an insurance program that would, in effect, supplement, or perhaps even replace, the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Has that council reported on its plan to the minister or to any other member of the executive?

Senator Argue: I shall have to take the question as notice. I know that the Canada Grains Council has made some studies, but we have not reviewed this in any depth.

Senator Roblin: One of the functions of the Canada Grains Council is to make recommendations to my honourable friend as the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board as well as to other ministers. I believe that the report of the Canada Grains Council on the insurance plan has been made to the minister. In that case, does the minister intend to table it in this chamber?

Senator Argue: I will be happy to do that, but I shall take the suggestion as notice and respond later.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government. It deals with the fact that on many occasions ministers are unable to be present in this chamber. I suggested last session that, to alleviate this problem, there may be merit in appointing senators as parliamentary secretaries. In light of the newly established Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, perhaps the government should appoint Senator Kirby as a parliamentary secretary so that he may answer questions on fisheries.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a good suggestion and I shall take it up with the powers that be.

Hon. C. William Doody: You mean "power"—singular!

THE CABINET

STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Murray on December 20, 1983 concerning whether the rule of Cabinet solidarity is suspended when ministers appear before or make submissions to the Macdonald commission.

I would like to refer you to the government's policy, which was clearly stated by Senator Austin, the first minister to appear before the commission last fall. In his presentation Senator Austin noted that, in order to assist the commission, a number of his Cabinet colleagues would make submissions to it and some ministers would have the opportunity of speaking to the commissioners directly, as he did, during that stage of its work. Their purpose in speaking to the commissioners was not to present the government's views on the complex issues referred to the commission or to advocate particular solutions or firm policy positions. Rather, they would try to assist the commission in defining the problems and challenges facing Canada, as the ministers see them in their own work.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—VACANCIES

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on January 16 concerning the appointment of members to the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

No appointments have yet been made to fill the vacancies on the board, which, I am sure, is not startling news to Senator Muir. The selection is an ongoing process which includes the participation of both the federal government and the Government of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): "Ongoing" is right—ongoing forever!

Senator Frith: Announcements will be made in due course.

Hon. Robert Muir: It has been going on for years.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guy: Do they appoint senators?

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Guay on January 16 concerning the Garrison diversion project.

The United States side agreed at a meeting on November 21 to seal with concrete an outlet of the Lonetree Dam which could be used to transfer Missouri River water and harmful biota to the Hudson Bay system. The two sides agreed at the meeting to establish a joint technical committee composed of senior technical representatives from the two federal governments, the Province of Manitoba and the State of North Dakota. The technical committee will deal with other Canadian technical concerns related to Phase I which were identified in a note to the United States authorities dated October 3, 1983, and will monitor construction of Phase I features. The technical committee will also function as a much needed "early warning system" to alert the Canadian government regarding technical considerations of any future project features potentially harmful to Canadian water which might be proposed as part of Phase II.

I received what I have just read last week and held on to it until I could find out whether the committee had actually been meeting recently. Government officials from both sides conferred to define the mandate and terms of reference of the committee. Consequently, the committee met in December and is due to meet again in February.

A decision on the McClusky fish screen will be taken within three months, following further study by the joint technical committee.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION

STATUS OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I also have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on January 17 regarding the status of a bill to succeed Bill S-31.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs informs me that at this time the government has no immediate plans to introduce a successor bill to Bill S-31. As to the effective date of Bill S-31, it is clearly of no effect since the bill died on the Order Paper last session. Should similar legislation be introduced this session, it would certainly not be retroactive to November 2, 1982.

The minister wishes to make clear, however, that the issue of provincial government ownership of corporations operating in fields of federal jurisdiction is still of real concern. Similar limitations to those contained in Bill S-31 exist for broadcasting, banking, satellite telecommunication and air transport. The government remains keenly aware of the potential that companies in federal jurisdiction could be operated in other than the national interest. The problem is not likely to disappear in the future.

Until such time as the Opposition signals its intent to support measures that would protect federal jurisdiction in the field of transportation, the issue will not be elevated to a position of high priority by the government.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am rather confused by what the minister said. As I understand what the Acting Leader of the Government just read, the government considers the subject matter of Bill S-31 to be very important but it has no intention of doing anything about the matter unless the opposition—and what they mean by “opposition” is unclear, whether it is parliamentary opposition or some other form of opposition—signals its intent. That is a curious situation. The government thinks something should be done but, if anyone says that they do not agree with it, they do not intend to proceed. Would my honourable friend like to elaborate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that Senator Roblin's paraphrasing of the delayed answer is not exactly consistent with the statement made.

The specific answer is that a successor bill to Bill S-31 of the last session is not within the legislative planning at the present time. As the delayed answer states, “the issue of provincial government ownership of corporations operating in fields of federal jurisdiction is still of real concern.” The question is not one of high priority with the government.

With respect to the other question, Senator Roblin and others may wish to look at the answer as it appears. I note that the answer with which I was furnished has a capital “O” for “Opposition.” I assume that means the opposition in the federal parliament.

Senator Roblin: I hope this attitude is catching. I hope there are other government bills with which the opposition does not agree that the government will postpone until the opposition changes its mind. I am not sure that will ever happen; but this has been a useful precedent. I urge my honourable friend to think about this matter.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am sure there has been no change with respect to the government's open-minded, open-door policy and the fact that it always gives careful consideration to the views of the opposition with regard to legislation and, generally, with respect to the governing of the country.

Senator Roblin: In this particular case it seems to be a vacant mind as opposed to an open one.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to point out to Senator Roblin that it was not just the opposition who were opposed to this measure. The original bill was opposed by a committee of the Senate, inclusive of government supporters who sit on that committee, including me. I must say that I was not satisfied with the amendments later proposed by the government.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has raised a very good point. I am sad that the statement read to us this afternoon did not include the Senate as a body to which some credit ought to be given in respect of this new policy of holding things up until the Opposition, with a capital “O”, agree.

Senator Frith: In spite of the fact that I do not consider Senator Godfrey as capital “O” opposition, credit is certainly due to the Senate. On behalf of the government, I have no trouble in adding that the careful study given by the Senate committee to Bill S-31 was important and it played an important role in the government's decision.

Senator Godfrey: I am very loyal to the government. In fact, I am so loyal that I like to improve its legislation from time to time.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am not loyal but I, too, like to improve its legislation. It would be a good idea if more bills were introduced in the Senate in the first instance. In this way we could have a good crack at them. I am sure Senator Godfrey would not disagree with that.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, with respect to the answer given by the Acting Leader of the Government concerning Phases I and II of the Garrison project, I would like to read the answer again since I believe that Phase I is already complete. In view of the fact that the special committee held a meeting in December, could we obtain a copy of the report of that meeting? This is a matter of great interest for those of us who are from Manitoba.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to Phase I the decisions have been made but the construction has not yet been completed. What is mentioned in the answer is that there will be a monitoring of the construction of Phase I.

With respect to the honourable senator's request for a copy of the report of the committee, I have no information that a report was issued. What is stated in the answer is: “Government officials from both sides”—that is, Canada and the United States—“conferred to define the mandate and terms of reference of the committee.” If the committee issued a report or clarified the mandate and terms of reference, then I will try to obtain that information.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask my honourable friend to provide us with some supplementary information along the lines mentioned by Senator Guay. What arrangements are being made to publicize the findings or decisions of these committees? I must say that I am pleased to hear that these committees have been set up. I like the terms of reference which were read to us. I think they might go a long way towards relieving some of the anxieties; however, that is just step one. Step two will be to keep the public in the picture, particularly the public in the province of Manitoba where there is continuing widespread interest and concern with respect to this matter. Will my honourable friend tell us how these committees intend to keep the public informed of what their decisions are?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will try to obtain that information. The government treats the Garrison diversion project as an ongoing matter. I do not feel that when we give an answer that ends the matter. Senators Guay and Roblin ensure that we note it as a matter of ongoing concern. I would like to say that it is of concern to others outside of Manitoba, since it involves the question of Canada's water resources.

I am always pleased to field questions which keep the matter of the Garrison project before us. This enables me to obtain additional and ongoing information. I will endeavour to obtain the information asked for by Senators Guay and Roblin.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I agree with what Senator Roblin has said. I wish to emphasize the fact that we must rely upon the media to furnish us with answers to our questions. What I am endeavouring to do is obtain information from the government as soon as it is available. Surely the government receives information at approximately the same time as the media do. I would like to point out that we must read in the newspapers answers to questions which have been asked here. Never before has an answer been received by means other than reading it in the newspaper.

Senator Frith: Except for today.

Senator Guay: Yes, they are always ahead of you.

Senator Frith: I said that today you had an answer before reading it in the newspaper, as Senator Roblin has pointed out.

Senator Guay: I excuse myself, honourable senators. I should say that this is the first time I have heard about the meeting held on December 15. Perhaps I overlooked that bit of information in the newspaper. I hope that in the future we will obtain a report prior to reading about it in the newspaper. As Senator Roblin has said, it would be much better if announcements could be made by the government prior to our seeing them in the newspaper. This would benefit those people who are concerned with this particular matter.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, will the Acting Leader of the Government explain why he does not have an answer to the question I asked on January 19 last with respect to the highways agreement being one of the general development agreements between the Province of Newfoundland and the federal government? I understand that the minister was in Ottawa a couple of days ago, so there must be some reply with respect to whether or not the project is going ahead.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we commenced our sitting today I inquired about all outstanding questions. In each case I was informed that the questions have been forwarded to the respective authorities. In the case of Senator Marshall's question, it is simply a matter of our following it up in order to obtain the information requested.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, February 2, I shall call the attention of the Senate to certain activities of the National Film Board, in particular, the film entitled, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."

ACTING GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD— FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO DUTY AFTER ILLNESS

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Before we proceed to Orders of the Day, I would like to call the attention of all honourable senators to the fact that our Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Colonel Askwith, is back with us after an absence caused by his being confined to hospital for surgery. We are all very happy to have him restored to us.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the session.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has asked me to inform the house that he wishes to yield to Senator Bélisle.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I respond to the Speech from the Throne, and particularly to the first part of that Speech which deals with peacekeeping. In participating in the debate, I wish first to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the motion and then to compliment both the Acting Leader of the Government and the Acting Leader of the Opposition on the excellence of their performance.

Senator Bosa is known to be forceful and to the point with his views. With respect to Senator Jacques Hébert, it was a more difficult task for him in view of the fact that it was his first contribution in this chamber.

[Translation]

Nevertheless, I thought he spoke like a seasoned senator. In fact, he made an excellent presentation. His speech was very interesting, and I hope he will be rising in the Senate more often.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I also wish to offer my sincere congratulations to our new Speaker, Senator Riel. I am sure that, with his legal background he will maintain in his new capacity the decorum and direction so well established and preserved by his predecessors.

I also wish to congratulate another old friend, Senator Gildas Molgat, who has become our Acting Speaker. He is superbly qualified for this task.

At the same time, we regret the departure of the Honourable Jean Marchand. His vast experience, personal charm and great courage which, I am sure, will serve him well in his new duties, will long be remembered.

All senators are anxious to have Honourable Senators Jacques Flynn and Bud Olson with us again.

[English]

Honourable senators, while I recognize that there does not appear to be a definite solution to all of the economic and social problems caused or intensified by the depression, I think it must be recognized that people look to government to provide solutions. Government, by taking credit for all the job-creation programs has, in the public view, accepted the responsibility of providing employment or some alternative thereto. In any event, the government must accept the fact that, in view of the present economic conditions, a massive, determined and persistent effort must be made to overcome the effects of the depression we are enduring, and particularly the fact that over 11 per cent of our workforce is unemployed.

Indeed, honourable senators, I sometimes wonder just what are the priorities of the present government, since these are difficult to determine from the Throne Speech. After mentioning the need for youth employment, for example, the Speech goes on to state that the government plans to amend the divorce laws further so that divorces can more easily be obtained. When that legislation comes before us, it will be interesting to learn what organizations, if any, are demanding this measure, or is it merely the brainchild of the minister or someone else, wishing to further weaken the concept of family life in Canada? I shall have more to say on that subject personally.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, further to the chapter in the Throne Speech under the heading: "Canada's Role in Seeking World Peace", I have the following comments to make. The beginning of each new year is a time for marshalling our thoughts. Like mountain climbers, we now have a chance to look around, to look back on the winding path below and also to look forward, to plan how we shall climb to the next mountain top and over the next pass. The year 1984, whose outlines are still faint, raises feelings of anxiety for Canada and the world, in all those who take the time to reflect, even if they do so in the light of eternal hope.

Canada's future may be in serious danger. World peace is fragile, and the Middle East is already in a state of, as yet undeclared, war. Here and there, resources for improvement, pacification and unification continue to exist. The forces of restoration and peace depend on our freedom, on the freedom of all mankind. Today, there is a precarious balance between the forces of destruction and war and the forces of pacification and freedom.

The inheritance of advanced liberalism: In past years we have emphasized the long-term risks of a policy that exalted the individual to the detriment of the family, that introduced a host of government constraints to the detriment of free enterprise, that preferred an amoral civilization to a healthy and balanced view of man and society. Mike Pearson, one of our former Prime Ministers, who, as he said, was drifting towards a philosophy left of centre, followed the line of explicit permissiveness, a general loosening of policy and socialization according to the Swedish model, that is, achieving an egalitarian society through tax pressures. His successor, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, even in the face of his second set back, maintained a relatively prosperous economy although unemployment was not dealt with adequately. This kind of balance did not please Canadians at all. Those who had voted for him in 1974, believing he would restore the family, never forgave him for his ambivalent legislation, contraception for thirteen-year-old minors and abortion laws that were passed after an unprecedented use of the media. However, despite all this rhetoric, advanced liberalism never got back to left of centre. The Prime Minister's ambiguous policy towards the USSR and China did not work in favour of his re-election and was of no use to him at all in 1979. His defeat did not reflect a shift to socialism but the spite of disgruntled voters.

1983 was the year of greatest fertility of generations that used the pill and benefited from permissive laws from the age of puberty onwards. The increase in common-law marriages and the rising divorce rate has accelerated the demographic slump, while at the same time destroying the family unit. We now have 1.8 children per woman. If, as probably can be expected, we stay below that rate for any length of time—2.3 is the replacement rate—Canada will suffer irreparable harm. In several years, with austerity measures, we can get the economy back on track. We can also give freedom back to a people that was born to give freedom its Christian expression. However, if the present trend continues, we will not be able to bring back the desire to give life, the will to respect life, once there is a general abdication of moral responsibility, and the fertility rate has dropped so far and for so long.

For Canada, 1984 may be a year of very serious economic and social problems. It will not be, at least not yet, a year of political reckoning.

World peace offers a different picture. The USSR managed to put in place its SS 20's without being criticized by a single pacifist movement, either inside the country—which is not surprising—or outside the country—which makes one wonder. The pacifist movements finally got enough money for their propaganda and their media campaigns when it became clear that President Reagan would install a deterrent force, a modest one, in fact, compared to the Soviet threat, consisting of the cruise and the Pershing-2 missiles.

To understand the significance of re-establishing some kind of balance, we must remember the basic tenets of Soviet strategy. This strategy is based on a combination of a desire for absolute supremacy in the field of conventional and nuclear arms, and a policy of revolutionary wars, which are part of a stage-by-stage revolutionary progression, supported by the silent and omnipresent threat of the conventional and nuclear arms of the most powerful military force in history. As it happens, that combination represents what is called today the "indirect strategy". Unfortunately, that concept is far from being clear in the minds of a good many people, including even our leaders in government.

The "true nature" of Communism is that Lenin and then Mao came up with the concepts and the concrete techniques of subversive and revolutionary war. Subversive war exerts its influence through terrorism and propaganda, mainly to lure people into making a psychological transfer from their camp to the enemy camp. That is the kind of war we are witnessing these days in Beirut, Kuwait and London, if only to recall the incidents of the past few days. Through the assassination of a specific individual, it can also contribute to the destabilization of a country or a region. Let us imagine the consequences of three assassinations—two unsuccessful, Reagan and John Paul II, one successful, Sadat—within a few months.

Revolutionary war is different, although it does make extensive use of subversive war tactics. It is aimed at substituting a revolutionary government for a democratic government with a view to pushing the country involved from the free world into the camp of USSR satellites. Public opinion sees that as a coup d'état, at most. But that popular coup d'état is described by the Soviets and their objective allies as nothing more than an incident of internal policy. From within, such an incident would be seen as being revolutionary, but from without it could not in any way be considered as an act of war against a third country. That is what the Soviet Union imperturbably claims every time, even though it is indeed responsible—directly or through the Cubans, the Libyans or the East Germans—for organizing the "revolution" by providing money and weapons. In terms of global strategy, be it a new "step forward" or, of course, an invisible war, the Soviets take such measures while claiming that they are not doing anything wrong. Should neighbouring nations intervene with the support of the United States—remember the Island of Grenada—they are swiftly censured by the "universal conscience", including Mrs. Thatcher's. It can be seen clearly in such a case to what extent even so-called Conservative leaders have no idea of the true nature of Marxist-Leninism.

Marxist-Leninism blames those who defend themselves. A thorough analysis of these various events can be made only in the light of a unique though poorly understood concept of Marxist-Leninism: The spread of Communism in the world can be peaceful, to a considerable extent, provided those the Soviets want to conquer are made to feel guilty to the point that they refuse to defend themselves. As Clauzewits said:

War is caused not necessarily by invasion, but by the fact that the people being invaded resist the invader.

Marxist-Leninism claims that its conquest will be a peaceful one because it will be able to convince those being invaded that by defending themselves they will be responsible for the war.

This is what happened in Vietnam. By touting the slogan "Peace in Vietnam" all over the world, Moscow finally succeeded in having the country left to be conquered by Giap's army, and then left to the tyranny of the Communist Party. The same happened when the USSR invaded Czechoslovakia on August 20, 1968. The Soviets blamed the counter-revolutionaries who attacked the Warsaw Pact tanks in Prague. Today, and for years, the Soviets have pointed their SS 20 missiles westward. They are organizing pacifist propaganda in the West against deployment of the Pershing-2 and the cruise missiles against their own nuclear threat.

Let me make myself clear: When the USSR builds up its arms, it is acting in the interests of peace. If in some way or another the countries of the Free World obstruct this process, they are warmongers or Fascists, hawks, provocateurs, and the rest. That is the intellectual perspective underlying everything that has been happening between the Communist camp and the rest of the world for several decades.

Another important point is that to convince the victim that he started the war in the first place by defending himself, Marxist-Leninism has developed what should be called subversive war. Terrorism is an essential element of this process.

Pacifism which has come back to us in the protest against nuclear missiles, is a mixture of passion and moral aspirations. Passion includes fear—"rather red than dead"—and hate—"U.S. go home". Moral aspirations include a desire for peace, which is entirely legitimate and inextricably linked to determined non-resistance to Communism.

The indirect strategy of the USSR can be understood if we identify every act of subversive and revolutionary warfare. It is defined by General Beaufre as "one that depends for its decision making on resources other than military victories", in his "Introduction à la stratégie," on page 96.

The game of indirect strategy is played on a world scale. To a certain extent, the battle is not on the battlefield but outside. This is something the average westerner fails to understand.

The game is to move pawns ahead throughout the world, through subversive and revolutionary warfare, while at the same time paralyzing the adversary to keep him from intervening.

General Beaufre writes:

Procedures for dissuading from intervention run the entire range from very subtle to extremely brutal: Much will be made of respect for the legality of domestic and international law, of moral and humanitarian values, attempts will be made to give the adversary a guilty conscience in his struggle by making him doubt that his cause is just ( . . . ) indirect intervention will be used by sending arms, experts and volunteers ( . . . ) and finally, the threat of direct intervention.

This was written in 1963. General Beaufre went on to say:

However, these procedures cannot be effective unless the military deterrent force (nuclear or conventional) constitutes a global threat that is sufficient to paralyze any reactions, and unless the general strategy is part of a strong, cohesive policy.

If we give some serious thought to what General Beaufre has to say, which is still relevant twenty years after it was written—he is not expressing an opinion; he is giving us a clear and penetrating understanding of reality—we realize that 1983 was a year of set-backs for the USSR.

The global threat is balanced. The USSR cannot have a free hand throughout the world unless its conventional or nuclear deterrent force constitutes a real global threat. Such has been the case until now. Ever since Pershing II and cruise missiles have been deployed, notwithstanding peaceful pressure tactics and broken negotiations, that global threat is losing and will lose ever more its unilateral strength. It is becoming bilateral dissuasion, something definitely more conducive to disarmament. Thanks to the presence of "stand-by" nuclear weapons, dissuasion will no longer be aimed mainly at cities, but rather at the destruction of the enemy's arsenal. The USSR now realizes that a war would mean that her might would be the target of an immediate and effective nuclear strike. In that respect, the arbitrary strength of the Soviets and their freedom of action throughout the world are curtailed indeed. In addition, by the same token the possibility of a nuclear conflict is lessened. The revolutionary advance has been checked. Ever since Mr. Reagan became President, the policy of the United States has made it possible to neutralize paralyzing Communist manoeuvres. The Soviet march in Central America has come to a standstill. It was stopped in a spectacular display in Grenada. The Soviets are no longer free to do as they please in South Africa. In Angola, the pro-Soviet government can hardly retain control over one third of the country. In Mozambique, the resistance movements are gaining ground and the disappointed Soviets create famine by cutting supplies to a satellite which is slipping through their hands. Egypt, Somalia and Sudan have freed themselves. In Afghanistan, the resistance was costly, but it is growing more effective. In Poland, since the last visit of the Pope and the award of the Nobel Prize to Lech Walesa—his moral authority is even stronger than it was when Solidarity was synonymous with union victories—the misery bred by socialism grows worse each passing month and government pressure on the church is stronger. It can therefore be said that, as we enter 1984, the response of western nations to the indirect strategy of the Soviets is indeed promising on the global scene. Still it remains no less undecisive in the most sensitive spot—the Middle East.

The unremitting effort of the Syrians to take over, if not destroy, heroic Lebanon, the Israeli willingness to gamble the future of a whole nation, the Palestinian drama, the Libyan and Iranian terrorism, the war between Iraq and Iran, and the threat against the unobstructed shipping of free countries in the gulf all combined to make of that corner of the world the major unknown factor this early in 1984. Anything can happen. In fact, war has already broken out. The super powers are present and may become involved. Since they cannot agree, they are neither in a position to impose peace nor to withdraw. What will prove strongest, tragic events and blind passion or a joint political will to negotiate? The year 1984 promises to be an anxious year for Lebanon and for all countries involved in this struggle, either for or against. Much depends on an agreement between France and the United States in that part of the world.

We are starting a new year that would seem to offer a far greater challenge than previous years. The world economic situation may escalate from the problematic to the dramatic. In the Middle East, there is a chance that a sizable conflict could become widespread. Taking the worst scenario, although not the most likely one, such a conflict might become worldwide through the involvement of the two superpowers.

At the same time, the socialist object lesson is bearing fruit. The rejection process is more serious, more widespread and more profound than the one that followed the liberalism of the seventies. At the international level, the power of the Soviets is being restricted. Revolutionary advances on various continents are now being contained. The vast majority of mankind lives and dies without God and without religion. Today, the very existence of mankind is at stake.

This century is one of the bloodiest in history. For the first time, the world has the means to destroy itself. We find more or less the same message in the introduction to the Throne Speech:

Violence stalks many lands. The resort to force is a daily occurrence. The nuclear threat preys upon the hopes and dreams of every man and woman on the planet. The pursuit of peace must be the paramount goal of mankind.

Mr. Trudeau continues his long pilgrimage throughout the world. "For peace and virtue", nobody openly levels reproaches. All countries, at least in their official statements, favour peace. However, the moment peace has to be defined and means to achieve it have to be found, strong dissensions appear. Mr. Trudeau has been witness to those dissensions everywhere. On behalf of poor countries, Mrs. Indira Gandhi has rejected any bargaining between those who have nothing and those who have everything. The small nuclear powers—China, England and France—feel it is ridiculous to talk about reducing their arsenal since it amounts to precious little when compared with that of the superpowers.

Always the polite neighbour, Mr. Reagan welcomed Mr. Trudeau on December 15. Being a charming host, he did support the efforts of the Canadian Prime Minister, but he sees no point in holding a summit which nobody wants. As to the USSR, what with the mystery surrounding Andropov, they finally wrote him a letter suggesting that the meeting be put off. How can anyone think that the Soviet leaders would attend a summit now that they are leaving all negotiation tables? Mr. Trudeau's answer is that the situation is so precarious that everything must be done to resume the dialogue.

The credentials of the witness? Mr. Trudeau is nearing the end of a career which, in some respects, has been glorious. In a free world where politicians have short-lived careers . . .

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Do you know something that we don't know?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Present tense.

[Translation]

Senator Bélisle: If the Acting Leader of the Government will be patient for a few minutes, he will have the answer!

In a free world where politicians have short-lived careers, he has now been Prime Minister for nearly 15 years. And yet, as he begins this peace mission, his popularity has sunk to a new low in Canada. The economic crisis has severely shaken the social democrat concept which has always been his source of inspiration. He has always been a strong advocate of open dialogue with the Communist world—and President Carter saw eye to eye with him—but that has not prevented the Soviets from gaining ground in many countries of the world.

Honourable senators, can a witness have moral weight in the world when he has lost most of his prestige at home? Just what is it that motivates this pilgrim who, all of a sudden, tries to swim against a strong current? What are his objectives, what are his means?

However sincere and worthy his objectives, they seem to be blemished by end-of-career opportunism. This very difficult situation calls for patience and perseverance. It has been said that the Soviets are waiting to know whether President Reagan will run again, or even whether he will be re-elected. They will have to wait for a year, but Mr. Trudeau can wait no longer. He needs an international achievement, either to shore up his reputation at home or to bask in glory at the end of his career. Many men who still view themselves as eccentric intellectuals juggling with politics are eager to leave their mark on history. It is really difficult to find total selflessness in such men. Their objectives have either a political or a personal dimension.

What means do they use? The only one to be perfectly well identified is the fear of a nuclear conflict. This threat is horrendous as no one has any comprehensive idea of the results of such a conflict. However, would a weakening of the western world to the point of opening the door still wider to Soviet domination be a step towards peace? What kind of peace can many expect for the year 2000? Is preserving our freedom for a return to economic prosperity a meaningful objective? Is it even desirable?

Is Mr. Trudeau's pilgrimage completely useless? If it does help to delay by a few hours, a few months or a few years a nuclear catastrophe, it will already have been enormously successful, at least in appearance. However, a delay or a hope of freedom can never be an end by itself. In God's plan, freedom is a prerequisite for love. We are given freedom the better to serve man. If it is true that man is faced with two threats, any action which makes man more powerless in the face of power, anything which promotes the progress of totalitarianism, is not a peace gesture, but the triumph of war against man. This is why the apparent virtue of pacifism is a false one which promotes the reverse of the proposed objective. It has indeed been proven that it is manipulated everywhere by the Marxist ideology. Mr. Trudeau is not such a pacifist. He wants bilateral disarmament. But, honourable senators, what will incite Communism toward disarmament?

Whatever Mr. Trudeau's intentions, it must be recognized that this new stage of his peace mission is being met by scepticism and great indifference in Europe. The Davos incident in Switzerland last weekend will go on provoking a lot of comments. The words addressed by Mr. Trudeau to Mr. Kenneth Dam, the American Assistant Under-Secretary of State and the former French Prime Minister, Mr. Raymond Barre, have considerably weakened and seem to discredit Mr. Trudeau as an impartial pilgrim.

If the preservation of our freedom simply promotes the other threat against man, namely "money which corrupts man from within," it does not constitute an effective action for peace either, as man, corrupted from within, can only be a source of conflict with others. The delay and the freedom which Mr. Trudeau could preserve have meaning only if the space thus created is taken by a substantial spiritual movement.

If I sometimes support Mr. Reagan's firmness, it is not because I see any answer in an American-style materialism. The firmness of the United States and the allied nations is an essential rampart against totalitarianism. However, like Solzhenitzyn, I am firmly convinced that Communism will be defeated from within, by the moral strength of those who suffer oppression, as the threat of money which corrupts man from within in the western world will be defeated by the return of men to Jesus the Saviour.

Hon. Philip Deane Gigantes: Before replying to Senator Bélisle, who has made some quite surprising comments which do not correspond to strategic and military facts either numerically or logically, I would like to thank the Acting Leader of the Opposition, who is now leaving the chamber.

[English]

I should like to say some nice things to Senator Roblin, who kindly suggested that some of us who had been appointed two weeks ago should move over and join him. If he were alone in the Conservative Party, one would find that an easy thing to do, indeed. He has always been a remarkably liberal man in his thinking and in his sentiments. I only wish that he were Leader of the Conservative Party in Manitoba right now so that we would not have the ugliness there that is generated by members of a party which once was graced by Senator Roblin but which, alas, he no longer leads.

● (1550)

Senator Bélisle refers to the Davos incident. He should blame Mr. Reagan. In October 1981, Mr. Reagan suggested a nuclear war could break out in Europe without Washington starting a world war. Mr. Trudeau only quoted the President of the United States. At that time, the Europeans were shocked the same way they are now.

What is Mr. Trudeau suggesting to Mr. Kenneth Dam? The Prime Minister told Mr. Dam he cannot flatly state armaments are being reduced when they are being replaced by much more efficient and dangerous ones. The Commander of NATO, the American General Rogers, in a number of statements mentioned that he boasted constantly of replacing old weapons by new, much more efficient ones. In fact, the nuclear warheads that were withdrawn from Europe—there were 32,000 in 1964, as against 25,000 now—were obsolete and inadequate. They were replaced by much more precise warheads, which are capable of reaching their targets more easily and are a much greater menace to the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Trudeau is only repeating the evidence as already stated by the Americans themselves. I cannot understand why Senator Bélisle and the opposition members in the other place so bitterly opposed the Prime Minister's comments. He only told the truth.

We have reached a point which Mr. Kissinger described as absurd. Mr. Kissinger, the former Republican Secretary of State of the United States, indicated that the number of nuclear weapons is now so great that they defy logic. I will quote you some figures.

[English]

The Soviet Union now has a sufficient supply of nuclear warheads to create 352,761 Hiroshimas. The Americans have only 135,700 such warheads. "Russian superiority"—it is nonsense to speak in terms of superiority or in terms of balance. We are talking about exploding the planet several times over. It only needs to be done once in order to annihilate mankind.

Mr. Trudeau has been arguing that it would be a good idea for the five nuclear powers to meet. One of the things he wants to demonstrate in such a meeting is the principle of sufficient deterrence followed by the British, the French and the Chinese. Those three nations have enough deterrents to destroy twice over the major cities of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union has enough nuclear weaponry to destroy, several times over, all of the cities of the United States. Using its submarine borne missiles alone, the Soviet Union can destroy, 50 times over, every city in the United States with a population of over 10,000. The United States, with its submarines, can do exactly the same thing to the Soviet Union. Fifty times over is 49 times too many, in terms of deterrence.

[Senator Gigantes.]

Honourable senators, it is dangerous to have so much weaponry. It leads to the development of nasty things—the genie is coming out of the bottle. Our scientists are developing weapons which are more frightening than anything ever seen before. In 1982, Novosti, a Soviet news agency, stated that, if the west installs Cruise and Pershing missiles in Europe, the Soviet Union will launch on warning. That is, the minute some shadows appear on Soviet radar screens indicating, perhaps, that missiles are on their way, the conflagration will begin.

I do not believe they would do that, but they might be tempted. They might be scared enough to do it. Some drunken Soviet officer might have a problem of alcoholism. Some mad Soviet officer, or indeed some mad American officer, might be tempted to press the button upon seeing something on the electronic screen; and the terrifying thing is that on many occasions there have been such false alarms on our electronic screens. There was an occasion when a Canadian officer, in Colorado, was in charge of NORAD and the screens showed what appeared to be a Soviet missile launched against North America. The Canadian was cool enough to ask a question: "Can the CIA tell me where Mr. Khrushchev is?" The CIA replied, "He is sunning himself on the shores of the Black Sea," and the Canadian officer said, "Well, then it is not a nuclear war. There is something wrong with the radar." He was right.

But it is a dangerous situation. It is all the more dangerous when the two superpowers stop talking to one another; when all the diplomatic reports received, not only by our country but by the Americans, the French and the Germans, are to the effect that the Russians are battenning down the hatches and saying, "You can't talk to Reagan; he will get re-elected. So forget any negotiation until 1989".

This is lovely for the generals, because, just as there are surgeons who operate too much because it is their trade and they like it, so, too, there are generals who dream of war, who think that war is something they would be interested in practising. They talk of a winnable nuclear war.

Mr. Teller, the father of the hydrogen bomb, said the other day that we should be building shelters, because, if we had them, only 50 million Americans would be killed. I repeat, only 50 million Americans would be killed. I say that the death of 50 million people should be and is sufficient deterrence; but the instrument of deterrence we need—this mutual fear, this holding by each of us of a faulty weapon which, if we fire it, will explode and kill us, too—is a very dangerous exercise. We are talking of coming generations. Reference was made to the fact that only 1.8 children per family are being begotten in our country. But there will not be any, if there are no survivors, and, if there are any survivors, even among those 50 million, the children they beget will be deformed.

Let us get back to what Mr. Trudeau said. What he said was the truth, and it is essentially truthful to say that it is doubtful whether a U.S. President, if he sees an attack launched against Europe, will decide that his country will commit suicide by launching an all-out war. I ask you, Senator Bélisle, if you were an American President, would you want 240 million Americans to commit suicide in order to save West Germany? That is what we are talking about. It would not even be a case of saving West Germany. Germany by then would be obliterated, even if the war were purely conventional. The Soviet Union has 42,000 pieces of heavy artillery, 37,000 tanks, and 21,000 bombers. Each of those figures is at least triple its counterpart in NATO. Those engines of war are armed with new bombs, which pack in each ounce of their weight several times the destructive power of World War II weapons.

I was in World War II and I saw what that did. There would be nothing left of Western Europe, if a conventional war were fought there. So, senator, let us assume that you are the American President, that you are sitting in your bunker deep under the earth, and you ask, "Shall I also kill my own people?" I would ask another question. Do you suppose that the Germans are not thinking about it and discussing it? Are we fooling the Russians by not discussing it? Mr. Barre is the most mystifying one of all. I can understand a member of the other place, an opposition critic on matters dealing with External Affairs, speaking outside Parliament and saying that Mr. Trudeau should not say such things in case the Kremlin hears him. That member is not very well versed in foreign affairs.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Senator Gigantes: He has always had some excessive habits. As a journalist, I have observed him speaking. He has a drive for the jugular which makes him forget logic. But Mr. Barre, the former Prime Minister of France and a Gaullist, was one who always backed the French deterrent force. Why did the French want a deterrent force if they trusted the American protective umbrella? Why did the British? Are they fools to spend all that money for no reason at all? No. They reasoned that, faced with a choice between asking his people to commit suicide and not defend Europe, an American President might say, "I will not defend Europe." That is why Britain and France built their deterrent forces—and also China. They represent minimal deterrent forces, only enough to dissuade the Soviet Union from attacking.

So we are not to discuss this? We are not to discuss the fact of the French deterrent force and the English deterrent force, which are illustrations of what Mr. Trudeau was saying? So that the Russians will not understand what we are up to? They are not idiots. One could say all kinds of things about the evils of communism, but the Russians are not idiots. Regarding the evil of communism, I am second to none in believing that communism is harmful. I was their prisoner for three years. They tortured me. I do not like them. I would rather die than live under communism. Nevertheless, they are there. We cannot kill them, eliminate them, destroy them, because in so doing we would destroy ourselves. We have to reach some accommodation with them. We have reached the stage of mutual terror and Mr. Trudeau is saying that is not satisfactory, that there could be a mistake, an accident. There could be an error. There could be madness on the part of a Soviet submarine commander, who fires his missiles. They reach the United States, they hit some U.S. cities, and the U.S. ripostes—and the earth is finished, and we are all dead!

Regarding the credibility of the Prime Minister, I suggest that it is irrelevant to talk about the credibility of anyone who wants to argue that we must discuss methods of reducing the great danger facing the survival of mankind, the survival of the planet Earth itself. Only the cockroaches and the rats might live after us. I believe it is sinful to discuss the credibility of someone who is saying, "Please let us find some way of moving back from mutual terror as being our only protection for peace."

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I am fully aware of the rules. The Acting Leader of the Government gestured towards Senator Muir. If there are questions, I am prepared to answer them, but in doing so I would be making a second speech.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I did not mean to cut off Senator Bélisle. I merely thought that Senator Muir was about to adjourn the debate, and I simply gestured towards him. If there were some profit in having an exchange between Senator Bélisle and Senator Gigantes, there would be no objection to Senator Bélisle's saying something further.

On motion of Senator Muir, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 2, 1984, at 2 p.m.

In the course of its deliberations, the Committee received valuable assistance from many sources.

We first thank the individuals and organizations who appeared as witnesses in Ottawa or in the twelve other cities that the Committee visited. Since part of our mandate was to report on ways in which the Senate could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada, we benefited particularly from the views we received during the public and private meetings held in the provincial and territorial capitals. We would also like to express special appreciation for the courtesies extended to us by provincial and territorial governments.

In addition to the views expressed to us orally, of equal benefit were the many letters, briefs and submissions sent to us by individuals as well as groups.

The Committee also wishes to acknowledge the contribution of the Senators and members of the House of Commons who participated in the work of the Committee. Our express thanks are extended to the previous Joint Chairman from the House of Commons, the Honourable Roy MacLaren, who was appointed to the Cabinet in August 1983 and subsequently resigned from the Committee.

We wish to thank our Joint Clerks, Paul Belisle from the Senate and Maija Adamsons from the House of Commons who managed the administrative, financial and logistical aspects of the Committee's work.

An equally important arm of the central staff was the research team, which comprised people from both the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade and the Research Branch, Library of Parliament. John Hayes, as Director of Research from the Centre, co-ordinated the efforts of the team with respect to the preparation of background papers, the analysis of evidence and the drafting of the report. With the collaboration of Messrs. Louis Massicotte, Bruce Carson and John Terry from the Research Branch, Library of Parliament, the research team provided professional expertise to the Committee. Peter Dobell of the Centre, as Study Director, contributed invaluable during the report-writing stage of the Committee's work.

Finally, the Committee would like to thank the staff of the Senate and House of Commons Committees Directorates, the Translation Bureau of the Secretary of State Department, the Canadian Government Printing Office, and the other services of the Senate and of the House of Commons whose contributions were of unique importance in assisting the Committee in carrying out its mandate.

CHAPTER 1

The Committee's Conclusions

We have concluded that the Canadian Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada.

An appointed Senate no longer meets the needs of the Canadian federation. An elected Senate is the only kind of Senate that can adequately fill what we think should be its principal role — the role of regional representation. We propose a Senate different in composition and function from the House of Commons and from the present Senate. The second chamber we recommend is designed specifically — by its distribution of seats, by the way it is elected, and by the powers it exercises — to represent the sometimes diverse interests of the people of Canada's provinces and territories in federal legislation and federal policies.

In fulfilling that role, an elected Senate would strengthen the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country.

We reached this conclusion after reviewing the work of previous inquiries into the question of Senate reform and after hearing the testimony of witnesses in all provincial and territorial capitals. We also benefited from the advice contained in the more than 280 briefs submitted to the Committee. We were told frequently that, after so many abortive attempts at Senate reform, the time has come for vigorous action — for fundamental change in the Senate — and that it would be a mistake to adopt inconsequential reforms.

Our conclusion was not reached lightly or easily. Although a substantial part of the testimony we heard favoured direct election, a roughly equal part opposed it, mainly on the grounds that a parliament with two elected houses cannot be reconciled comfortably with the principle of responsible government as it has operated in the British and Canadian traditions. Some highly respected people in public life and in the academic community prefer a reformed system of appointment to election. Among this group is one member of our Committee.

Although a reformed appointed Senate could bring about some needed improvements, we are persuaded that it would lack the political mandate to fill what we believe is the Senate's primary role. Only a politically strong second chamber can dispute, when necessary, the decisions taken by a government that is supported by the House of Commons. Therefore only an elected Senate can satisfy the original intent of the fathers of Confederation: the provision of a chamber that would balance judiciously the power of the Commons (which is based on representation by population) by safeguarding the legitimate interests of the people of the less populous provinces.

In proposing an elected Senate we are rejecting not only a reformed system of appointment, but also certain other proposals that have been made in recent years. One of these is abolition of the Senate. It is a course of action that from time to time has appealed to some Canadians, and it is the preference of one member of our Committee. However, the weight of the testimony brought before the Committee was overwhelmingly opposed to abolition.

Another option we reject is the creation of a legislative chamber composed wholly or in large part of delegates of provincial governments acting under the instructions of those governments. Proposals for such a chamber are usually inspired by the German Federal Council, the Bundesrat. A Bundesrat is appropriate for Germany, where the Länder (the German provinces) have relatively little legislative and financial autonomy compared with Canadian provinces and where institutionalized co-ordination of federal and Land activities is made virtually mandatory by the fact that the Länder are heavily involved in administering federal legislation. The Canadian federal system is quite different, and a Bundesrat-type chamber could lead to serious problems. We share the view, contained in the 1980 report of the sub-committee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (the Lamontagne Report), that such a chamber would subordinate, in an inappropriate way, the federal legislature to the executive branch of the provincial order of government. It would, in the words of that report, make the federal Parliament a hybrid amounting to a monstrosity.

Nor do we consider that a system of 'indirect' election — the election of senators by members of Parliament or of the provincial legislatures — would result in any significant change in the role and political authority of the present Senate.

It has been pointed out to us that only a few years ago many people were recommending a Bundesrat-type Senate, and some have asked whether direct election is a fad, a passing interest that will fade as quickly as did interest in the Bundesrat. To respond, as one journalist has, that "democracy is never a fad" is perhaps too simplistic, but there is truth in that response. It seems to us that direct election is the proper path for Canada's long-term political and constitutional development.

Many witnesses who favoured an elected Senate were quick to point out that embracing the principle of direct election is only the first, although an important, step. It is also necessary to decide what kind of elected Senate would best suit Canada's parliamentary system of responsible government. We must also confront the difficult question of how to distribute among the provinces and territories the appropriate number of seats in such a politically powerful body.

We believe that Canada should establish an elected Senate designed in such a way that it would not be vying continually for supremacy with the House of Commons: it should have significant powers, but it should not be able to undermine Canada's well-tried system of responsible government. We therefore propose that the new Senate be given only a suspensive veto, which would allow time for national debate and reflection, but which the Commons could, after a suitable lapse of time, override by re-passing the legislation in question.

We also propose that every effort be made to ensure that senators have a significant degree of independence of party. Only then will they be able to speak in favour of local and regional interests without having to be concerned primarily, as members of Parliament must be, with adhering to party policy. A healthy measure of independence is therefore essential if the Senate is to fill its role of regional representation. This does not mean that senators would lose sight of the needs of the country as a whole.

It is for this reason, and also to distinguish senators from members of the House of Commons, we propose that senators be elected for a single but comparatively long term — nine years — with one-third of the senators being elected every three years. To lessen party influence in the choice of senators, all but one of us prefer 'first-past-the-post' elections in single-member constituencies to proportional representation in multi-member constituencies. Each province would be divided into as many constituencies as it had senators.

We recognize that, in the absence of proportional representation for an elected Senate, the political parties will have to work hard to achieve balanced representation from across the country in the Commons and the Senate. This is as it should be. In striving to do this, they will have to adapt their policies accordingly, and this can only benefit national politics.

On the question of the distribution of seats, the Committee was advised by nearly all witnesses across Canada that the division should be made not on the basis of the present four Senate regions but by allocating seats to each province and territory. We accept that this kind of allocation reflects more closely the diverse nature of Canada.

As to how many seats should be allocated to each province or territory, we recognize that there is no perfect solution. We believe that giving an equal number of seats to each province would not be appropriate, having regard to Canada's historical development and the configuration of its population. If each province had the same number of seats, five provinces with as little as 13.4 per cent of Canada's population would have a majority of seats if they had the support of the territories.

While the less populous provinces merit a stronger voice in Parliament, equal representation in the Senate would tilt the balance too far and would be unacceptable to the vast majority of Canadians, not only to those living in the two largest provinces. We therefore propose a compromise whereby most provinces would have an equal number of seats, but Ontario and Quebec would have more and Prince Edward Island and the territories would have fewer. Our proposal would, for example, give the four western provinces together as many seats as Ontario and Quebec jointly. We believe that most Canadians would agree that our proposed distribution, or something close to it, represents a fair solution.

One of the original purposes of the Senate, and indeed, of the federation itself, in 1867 was to help protect Canada's French-speaking minority. Today, that purpose can best be achieved by an elected Senate with a special voting procedure. We are therefore proposing that measures having linguistic significance be approved only by a double majority: that is, by a majority of francophone senators and by a majority of all senators. If such measures failed to be approved by the double majority, they would not become law, and Senate rejection of them could not be set aside by the House of Commons. For these measures, and for them alone, the Senate would have an absolute veto.

As we explain in the report, our proposals for the design of an elected Senate are interdependent, and it is important that they be considered together. These proposals contain some novel features and will require public discussion. To put in place any kind of elected Senate will require federal-provincial negotiation and subsequent constitutional amendment. As regards that process, some witnesses from Quebec and some members of the Committee suggested that so far-reaching a change as the introduction of an elected Senate should not be implemented without the agreement of the National Assembly of Quebec. All this will take time. Meanwhile, certain reforms to the present Senate should be made now.

These reforms are set out in detail in our report. They are designed to be consistent with an elected Senate, into which we hope the present Senate will evolve, and to help prepare the way for it. For a couple of members of our Committee, who believe that an elected Senate should be introduced only after a lengthy period of public discussion, these reforms are of particular importance. The reforms include the introduction of a fixed term for future appointments, the more flexible use of the Senate's powers in a way that could give the chamber a suspensive veto, and increased use of investigative committees. The implementation of these reforms will provide a basis for assessing how much more effective an appointed Senate would be and could confirm whether the Committee is justified in its judgement that the election of senators is necessary.

Some witnesses said that reforms are needed in other institutions, such as the House of Commons and the Supreme Court. Our terms of reference do not allow us to comment on those suggestions. We should say, however, that the reforms we propose for the Senate do not preclude and need not delay any desirable reforms in other institutions.

It is our conviction that an elected Senate along the lines we propose would strengthen Parliament and make a significant contribution to easing some of the tensions that have troubled our country in the last decade. We believe that our conclusions on these important matters merit consideration by the federal and provincial governments and by all those who are concerned about our national well-being and the effectiveness of our political institutions.

We urge the government to implement our recommendations as soon as practicable and request, pursuant to Standing Order 69(13), a comprehensive response to this report.

CHAPTER 2

The Committee's Hearings and Discussions

On December 20, 1982, the Senate adopted a motion establishing a Special Joint Committee "to consider and report upon ways by which the Senate of Canada could be reformed in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country". The Committee's report was to include recommendations concerning the method of selection and length of term of senators, the powers of the Senate, the distribution of seats, and other matters that the Committee considered relevant to the reform of the Senate. An identical motion was adopted in the House of Commons on December 22, 1982.

On April 21, 1983 the two houses of Parliament appointed 8 senators and 10 members of the House of Commons to the Committee. The Committee convened for the first time on April 28 and elected the Honourable Senator Gildas L. Molgat and Mr. Roy MacLaren, MP as joint chairmen. Mr. MacLaren was appointed to the Cabinet on August 13, and the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, P.C. was elected to replace him on September 20. Following the prorogation of Parliament on November 30, the Committee was reconstituted in the Senate on December 8 and in the Commons on December 13.

The Committee was able to draw on the experience of a number of its members who had worked with the special joint committees on the Canadian Constitution that sat in 1970-72, 1978 and 1980-81, with the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution (1978-79), and with the Senate sub-committee on Certain Aspects of the Constitution (1980). Some members had also had experience at the provincial level while others had been federal Cabinet ministers.

As an initial step, we reviewed past proposals for reform. Numerous reports or bills have dealt with aspects of this issue since 1968. We were able to benefit from the thought that has been given to the subject by the federal government and by the governments of British Columbia, Alberta and other provinces. Senate reform has also been the focus of various parliamentary committees, the Task Force on Canadian Unity, the Ontario Advisory Committee on Confederation, the Constitutional Committee of the Quebec Liberal Party, and the Canada West Foundation. In addition, a number of MPs have tabled bills on the subject. We also considered the discussion paper on Senate reform submitted on June 16, 1983 by the Minister of Justice.

The activities of the Committee were divided into three stages. From May 31 to June 29, hearings were held in Ottawa to obtain the views of parliamentarians — notably senators — and university professors. The hearings gave Committee members an opportunity to familiarize themselves with the issue and the proposed solutions. All federal parliamentarians had previously been invited to share their views on Senate reform with the Committee.

The Committee was empowered to travel within Canada. We decided to hold hearings across the country for two principal reasons. We felt it was important to learn how Canadians in general felt about an undertaking designed to produce a Senate in which all regions of the country would be truly represented. Second, the Constitution Act, 1982 stipulates that certain changes to the Senate require not only the consent of both federal houses, but also that of the legislatures of seven provinces with at least 50 per cent of the country's population. We deemed it advisable to hear testimony from provincial political figures in their own provinces. At the outset of our inquiry, we wrote to all premiers and to the leaders of the elected executives in Yukon and the Northwest Territories, informing them of our mandate and inviting them to present their views either in public or in private. We also wrote to the leaders of opposition parties represented in the provincial and territorial legislatures.

During September and October, the second stage of our activities, public hearings were held in the capital cities of each province and territory as well as in Ottawa. The schedule of meetings held outside the national capital was flexible enough to give to the general public an opportunity to appear before the Committee and discuss the issue with parliamentarians. Private meetings were held with a number of provincial premiers and ministers. The Leader of the elected executive of the Northwest Territories appeared publicly as a witness.

During these two stages, we heard testimony from 119 witnesses, including 30 organizations (see Appendix B). Some 280 Canadians submitted written briefs or letters (see Appendix C). We were impressed with the high quality of the opinions presented and with the interesting proposals submitted, and we are grateful to all Canadians who took the time to share their views with us.

The third and final phase of our work took place in camera. During 14 such sessions the Committee reviewed the evidence and examined various options, weighing them against the objectives contained in our orders of reference. These deliberations led to the conclusions and recommendations in this report.

The Arguments for Senate Reform

In this chapter we describe the arguments that have been made for reforming the Senate. These arguments spring from a belief that, in one way or another, the Senate has not filled its role adequately. It is therefore appropriate to look first at the role originally intended for it and at the evolution of that role.

The original purpose of the Senate

The Senate was created in 1867 to fill not one but two major roles in the new federation. One was to protect and represent, so far as federal legislation was concerned, what Sir John A. Macdonald called "sectional interests".

Sectional interests include those interests peculiar to a region or to a linguistic or religious group. In this report we use the more familiar term 'regional interests'. The other major role was to help ensure political stability by acting as a counterweight to the popularly elected House of Commons. These two roles were to be carried out by the exercise of 'sober second thought' in the review of legislation emanating from the lower house — a house that drew its mandate from election based on population, although in those days the franchise was restricted.

As the powers of the national government in the federal system were to be relatively large, the Senate's check on the use of those powers was to be comparatively strong. The second chamber was given powers equal to those of the House of Commons except with regard to money bills.

The role of protecting and representing regional interests was reflected in the structure of the Senate. An equal voice was given to each of the three Senate divisions (or regions, as they have come to be called): Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritime provinces. Each of the three regions — to which a western region was added later — had an equal number of seats, regardless of the size of its population. This meant that both the less populous provinces and the predominantly French-speaking province of Quebec were to be given some protection against the wishes of a simple majority of Canada's population, as represented by the decisions of the House of Commons. Historians say that without this protection there would have been no federation. As George Brown, a prominent father of Confederation from Upper Canada, said: "Our Lower Canada friends have agreed to give us representation by population in the lower house, on the express condition that they could have equality in the upper house. On no other condition could we have advanced a step."

At the same time, it is our understanding that there was also a concern to ensure representation for the English-speaking minority in Quebec. This group, already protected in the Quebec Legislative Assembly by section 80 of the Constitution Act, 1867, received additional protection in the Senate. Each of the 24 senators for that province was to represent one of the 24 electoral divisions of Lower Canada and was to reside or own property there. Because of the way the anglophone and francophone populations were distributed within the province, this helped to ensure that some Quebec senators would be English-speaking.

The Senate's other role — acting as a counterweight to the popularly elected House of Commons — was reflected in the way senators were chosen. They were to be appointed rather than elected, and only from among those citizens who were at least 30 years of age and who possessed property worth at least $4,000.

Implicit, therefore, in the role of the Senate were the representation and protection of several minorities: the people of the less populous provinces, the French- or English-speaking people of Quebec, and people with property.

The evolution of the Senate's role

The most important development affecting the role of the Senate since 1867 has been the gradual change in public attitudes, not only in Canada but worldwide, toward appointed or indirectly elected legislative bodies. The resulting loss of political authority meant first that the Senate's use of its so-called absolute veto over federal legislation came to be resented and, subsequently, that the Senate was no longer prepared to use its powers except on rare occasions. The last bill to be rejected by the Senate was a 1961 government bill to change the Customs Act, although the Senate has successfully amended a number of bills since then. One important consequence of this development was that senators could no longer act as politically powerful representatives of regional interests. The Senate's role therefore evolved toward one that complemented rather than competed with the popularly elected House of Commons. Its principal functions are now improving legislation and investigating questions of public policy.

The arguments for Senate reform

Criticisms have been directed at the Senate for some years. They include the partisan nature of some Senate appointments; the poor attendance of some senators; the underrepresentation of women, aboriginal peoples and ethnic groups; the numerous Senate vacancies that are allowed to continue unfilled; the lack of balance in the number of senators affiliated with the different parties; the constraints that party discipline imposes on the independence of senators; and the fact that the present distribution of seats does not reflect the growth of western Canada's population. It is argued that all these deficiencies have seriously hindered the effective functioning of the Senate.

However, the more recent arguments for Senate reform — notably those made to our Committee — have focused on achieving one of the original goals of the Senate: the protection and representation of regional interests. These arguments spring from a belief that Parliament needs a chamber that represents those interests with more political authority than can be achieved with a Senate appointed in the present way.

Witnesses suggested that this concern has its foundations in the emergence in Canada of regional pressures which, while they are not new, have become particularly acute. The intensification of Quebec's persisting concern with its autonomy has been one of the principal elements behind these pressures. Another has been the developing consciousness in the West of its growing strength. It is the perception of many people who live in the western provinces, and of some who live in the eastern provinces, that their views are not given sufficient weight in the decisions of the national government.

The principal complaint the Committee encountered was that federal institutions as they are now constructed are unable to express and mediate regional concerns. Although the Senate was originally designed to give the regions a weighted voice in Parliament's decisions, it is argued that this does not happen. Witnesses pointed out that regional interests are now forced to seek outlets through other means, often through provincial governments, and that this has helped to bedevil federal-provincial relations.

Those who argue for Senate reform, or for the reform of the House of Commons, say that institutional change can help the Canadian political system adapt to the new regional pressures. They do not argue that such change would solve all regional problems falling within federal competence. Rather the purpose would be to provide a better framework within which regional differences can be represented, debated and reconciled — a framework that gives the people of all provinces and territories a feeling that their views are given proper weight.

We were urged by almost all witnesses to ensure that our recommendations preserve and reinforce the capacity of the Senate to carry out those functions at which it has been most successful — improving legislation and investigating issues of public policy. It is universally acknowledged that the Senate makes a useful contribution to the work of Parliament in carrying out these functions. With reference to both private and public bills, the Senate holds public committee hearings that are especially effective because the Senate has members with specialized knowledge and considerable experience and who are for the most part — particularly in committee — inclined to be less politically partisan than members of the House of Commons.

Investigation is potentially a very important role for a reformed Senate. Senate committees can look into any number of subjects of public interest: the need for new legislation, the adequacy of existing legislation, the performance of the executive and the bureaucracy and, perhaps most important, the extent to which federal policies are equitable for regions and for minorities. It is said that investigation is one area where the present Senate has shown a commendable degree of independence from the executive. In recent years the Senate has investigated a number of important public issues, including poverty, the mass media, unemployment, inflation, aging, land use, science policy, national defence, relations with the United States and the proposed national security agency. The recommendations of Senate committees have frequently influenced public policy and have resulted in legislative and administrative action.

The focus of recent reform proposals

While a few witnesses recommended reform of the House of Commons, the great majority argued for reform of the Senate. This was partly because they recognized that the introduction of an element of proportional representation in the electoral system, which is seen by some as an alternative to Senate reform, appears to have been rejected by the national political parties. However, it is also because that alternative would not likely satisfy the demand of the less populous provinces for a way of mitigating the numerical dominance of the Commons by representatives from Ontario and Quebec. A further reason is that the Commons will continue to be subject to tight party discipline, whereas party discipline can be less strict in the Senate, because that chamber can be designed so that it does not control the fate of the government.

In the latter part of the 1970s many proposals for Senate reform envisaged giving the provincial governments direct representation as a means of accommodating regional interests, but very few witnesses who appeared before our Committee advocated this course. Their proposals concentrated instead on representing the views of the people of Canada's provinces and territories in the Senate. One important consequence of this development is that there has been increased interest in the possibility of a directly-elected Senate. It is an option that is attractive particularly to those who wish to give the Senate added political authority.

After so many abortive attempts at Senate reform, witnesses asserted that the time has come for vigorous action — for fundamental change in the Senate — and that it would be a mistake to adopt inconsequential reforms.

The options for Senate reform are examined in more detail in Chapter 5. In the next chapter, we consider the question of what the future role of the Senate should be and examine the objectives of Senate reform.

CHAPTER 4

The Future Role of the Senate and the Objectives of Reform

The first question to be considered by the Committee was what the role of a second chamber of Parliament should be. In this chapter we examine that question and go on to consider what the objectives of Senate reform ought to be.

Our conclusions are, briefly, that the principal role of Parliament's second chamber should be to represent the sometimes diverse interests of the people of Canada's provinces and territories — one of the main roles intended for it in 1867 — and that a major objective of reform should be to strengthen the Senate's capacity to fill that role.

The role of the Senate

We noted in Chapter 3 that the two original functions of the Senate were to represent regional interests and to be a counterweight to the democratically chosen House of Commons. We also noted that, in recent years, the Senate has performed — and performed well — two other functions: the technical improvement of legislation and the investigation of questions of public policy.

At various times it has been proposed that a reformed Senate should provide for the representation of particular interests, among them the following:

- the direct representation of the interests of the provincial level of jurisdiction in federal legislation and in the exercise of certain federal executive powers;
- the representation of national minorities — not only French-speaking Canadians but also aboriginal peoples, ethnic minority groups and visible minorities; and

- the representation of francophones outside Quebec and of anglophones in Quebec.

As well, a number of additional powers have been suggested for the Senate, including the power to review and disallow international treaties, senior appointments to regulatory bodies, and subordinate legislation such as regulations passed by orders in council.

A number of witnesses also proposed that the Senate's role should complement rather than compete with the role of the House of Commons. On the other hand, a comparable number of witnesses argued that the Senate should constitute a check on the executive, which is based primarily in the House of Commons.

We have considered carefully all the functions that a reformed Senate might perform — the original ones, those it has acquired, and the new ones proposed — and we conclude that the principal role should be to represent the sometimes diverse interests of the people of Canada's provinces and territories. As in 1867, one important aspect of that role should be the representation of Canada's French-speaking minority. We have reached this conclusion because we are persuaded that in a country of the size and diversity of Canada there should be checks and balances built into the national legislature that will be a restraint on actions taken in the name of a majority of the population, as represented by the House of Commons.

We recognize that these diverse interests are in large measure the subject of provincial jurisdiction. Education is the foremost example. By international standards, the scope of provincial jurisdiction is wide, which raises the question of why special representation of such interests is needed in Parliament. The fact is that any modern federal legislature exercising its own jurisdiction necessarily engages in activities that give rise to reactions that vary from one province to another. In Canada, these activities include, for example, levying customs tariffs and regulating transcontinental railways and broadcasting. We believe that the Senate, with a distribution of seats different from that in the House of Commons, should give weighted representation in legislation on such matters to the interests of the less populous provinces, as was intended in 1867. We also agree with many witnesses that a special Senate voting procedure on linguistic matters should be established to give added protection for the French-speaking people of Canada. This, too, would help fulfil the intentions of 1867.

We reject the view that the principal, or even a secondary, function of the second chamber should be federal-provincial co-ordination. Such co-ordination is, we think, best left to the federal and provincial governments. We have more to say about this in Chapter 5, when we comment on proposals that the second chamber be composed of provincial government delegates acting under instructions.

In addition to the primary function of regional representation, which is one that could give rise to competition with the House of Commons, the Senate should continue to undertake two complementary functions: investigation and the improvement of legislation. We believe that other functions should be no more than incidental to the performance of these three.

Representation of national and provincial minorities should not be achieved by reserving for them a specified number of seats in the Senate; but this conclusion should be regarded as provisional with regard to one important group of national minorities, the aboriginal peoples. Some aboriginal groups testifying before the Committee asked that a specified number of seats be reserved for them in the Senate and perhaps also in the House of Commons. However, they recognized that the outcome of other discussions concerning aboriginal peoples are relevant to this request, among them discussions about self-government. The report of the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Indian Self-Government stated that "the best way to promote Indian rights is through Indian self-government and not by special representation for First Nations in Parliament. Nevertheless, the situation of Indian peoples will change with self-government, and special representation in Parliament might in future offer benefits that cannot now be anticipated." There is also continuing consultation through the constitutional conference of federal and provincial first ministers, with the aboriginal peoples participating, on this and other constitutional matters affecting aboriginal peoples. For these reasons we believe that no action should be taken at the present time to establish separate Senate seats for the aboriginal peoples.

We also heard representations about provincial official-language minorities. Such minorities are concerned primarily about the effects of provincial legislation, whereas the Senate is concerned with the passage of federal legislation. Aside from certain provisions in the Constitution, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it is the workings of provincial politics, aided where appropriate by national public opinion, that are the main protection for these minorities. However, it would not be inappropriate — and might well be desirable — for any process of appointment or election of senators to result in the inclusion in the Senate of representatives from these minorities, so as to make the chamber as broadly representative as possible. Under a process of direct election this could be achieved through the choice of candidates, through the delineation of constituencies, or through the choice of an electoral system.

The Committee's objectives for Senate reform

Our primary objective is to strengthen the Senate's capacity to fill its role of regional representation. At the same time it is important to preserve and strengthen the Senate's capacity to improve the quality of legislation and to investigate questions of public policy and administration.

To meet our primary objective, any reform should ensure that senators have more political authority and a measure of independence from party discipline. However, we also consider it essential that the House of Commons continue to be the pre-eminent chamber in Parliament, so that our system of responsible government can continue to operate effectively. Finally, our overriding concern is to ensure that Senate reform will strengthen the authority of Parliament as a whole to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country.

If these objectives are achieved, we believe that the functioning of our political system would be improved. Provincial governments, which now frequently speak on behalf of the people of their provinces in federal as well as provincial matters, would no longer have to carry that additional load. The excessive political burden now thrust upon federal-provincial conferences and intergovernmental relations would be reduced, because there would be a new forum whose principal role would be to discuss openly and to reconcile competing regional interests in matters under federal jurisdiction. We do not argue that regional differences would disappear, but we do believe that the system for resolving them would be much improved and that regional tensions would be less troublesome.

CHAPTER 5

The Reform Alternatives

Introduction

In this chapter we review the arguments in favour of the various reform options in the light of the role we propose for the second chamber and the objectives of reform. These options are usually expressed in terms of how senators would be chosen. The four principal options are as follows:

- Reformed appointment — a second chamber whose members would continue to be appointed, but possibly in a different way, and that would undergo various reforms to improve its effectiveness.
- A Bundesrat — a council or second chamber whose members would be chosen by the provincial governments and who would vote according to their instructions.
- Indirect election — members of the second chamber would be elected by a two-tier process: that is, they would not be elected by the people of Canada but by MPs or provincial legislators from the different federal or provincial parties.
- Direct election — senators would be elected by the people of Canada.

Before we review the arguments for these reform options we should say something about another possible course of action — the abolition of the Senate without putting anything in its place.

The question of abolishing the Senate

Abolition as an option is not, strictly speaking, covered by the Committee's terms of reference. Very few people who made representations to the Committee advocated abolition. Nor was it the preferred option of the great majority of the various task forces and committees that have given extensive consideration to the role of the Senate in recent years. It is also clear from what we said in Chapter 4 that we believe the Senate should not only be retained but that it has an essential role to play in Canada's political system. However, abolition has appealed to some Canadians from time to time, and it is the preference of one member of our Committee. It may therefore be useful to set out the arguments for and against abolition.

The arguments put forward by those who favour abolition of the Senate include the following:

- The present Senate is so moribund and adversely regarded that no reform can 'resurrect' it.
- The Senate's legislative review and investigative functions could be carried out by the Commons or by special task forces, thereby saving the cost of a second chamber.
- The present system of appointment contradicts the principle of representation by population in Parliament and consequently harms the democratic process.
- Other changes, such as reform of the Commons or an institutionalized First Ministers Conference, could better achieve the objectives of reform.

The arguments that have been made against abolition are as follows:

- The establishment of the Canadian Senate in 1867, with equal representation of the three regions that existed at that time, was an essential part of the federal bargain. A second chamber representing the regions was considered then, as now, indispensable in a federation.
- A reformed Senate now offers by far the best opportunity to give the people of the less populous provinces a stronger voice in Parliament.
- The Senate has played a useful role in revising legislation and in investigating questions of public policy. Abolition would deprive Parliament of this valuable contribution to its work.

We believe that the arguments for retaining the Senate far outweigh the arguments for abolishing it. It appears to us that some of the priorities of the abolitionists are not the same as ours. For example, some who say that Commons reform is preferable to Senate reform attach high importance to remedying the party imbalance in Commons seats held across the country but little to giving the people of the less populous provinces a stronger voice in Parliament. We believe the latter is essential. We also believe that the Senate is ordinarily better suited than the Commons to carry out legislative review and investigation, partly because its members tend to be less partisan and partly because they have more time to devote to these functions.

Reformed appointment

A large number of witnesses who appeared before the Committee were in favour of retaining the appointment of senators, but also favoured changing the manner or term of appointment, along with other reforms. Many of these witnesses commented favourably on the findings of the Lamontagne Report.

The changes witnesses proposed to the method of appointing senators included the following:

- a fixed term for senators, from 6 to 10 years;
- nomination of half the candidates by provincial governments, or nomination of all of them by a group of reputable citizens in a manner analogous to the system for selecting federal judges; and
- appointment of senators following each federal or provincial election, in a proportion that reflects each party's share of the popular vote.

A number of other reforms would, it was argued, make an appointed Senate more effective and representative. They included the introduction of a suspensive veto which, it was believed, would be used more readily than the Senate's present absolute veto. Witnesses also said that there should be a greater proportion of seats for the western provinces and that more senators should be appointed from among minority groups and native peoples.

Those who advocate retaining the appointment of senators generally do so by arguing that it is a better option than direct election. They say that direct election would endanger the supremacy of the House of Commons and responsible government, whereas an appointed Senate would not compete with the Commons. They believe that an elected Senate would be more partisan and therefore less able to perform the three functions that this Committee has identified as being those that need strengthening — regional representation, legislative review and investigation. They also say that obtaining the necessary consent for constitutional change would involve further constitutional debate and might in any event prove impossible.

Those opposed to a reformed appointment process believe that any change short of direct election would not achieve the objectives of reform. A few go so far as to say it would be better to abolish the Senate than to tinker with the present arrangements. Their principal argument is that only direct election can give senators an adequate mandate to represent the people of the provinces and territories.

Most of the members of the Committee agree that direct election is the best course. However, because it could be some time before the necessary constitutional changes are made to allow direct election, we believe that some of the reforms proposed for an appointed Senate should be implemented immediately. We discuss these reforms in detail in Chapter 7.

A Bundesrat

In the late 1970s there were a number of proposals for a second chamber or council composed of delegates of provincial governments who would act on the instructions of those governments. These proposals were inspired by the example of the West German second chamber, the Bundesrat.

One proposal envisaged a council composed of provincial delegates, with each province having a number of votes that, as a general principle, varied with (but was not proportionate to) its population. The council would exercise an absolute veto over the use of the so-called federal overriding powers. These powers include the spending power, the now obsolescent power to disallow provincial legislation, and several others. The council would have no role in other federal legislation. It would be a new institution, one that did not necessarily imply the abolition of the Senate.

Other proposals envisaged the combination of a provincial absolute veto on the overriding powers with a suspensive veto on other federal legislation. These proposals implied the replacement of the present Senate with a second chamber along the lines of the West German Bundesrat. Provincial governments would therefore represent the regions for purposes of federal legislation. Their delegates would vote under instructions, and each province would have a number of votes that varied with its population, but was not proportionate to it.

Underlying these proposals was the belief that the primary function of the second chamber should be intergovernmental co-ordination. However, most of the proposals envisaged a somewhat one-sided co-ordination, inasmuch as provincial initiatives that affected federal policies and programs would not have been subject to any institutionalized federal veto or input.

In the policy paper The House of the Federation, published in August 1978 following the tabling of Bill C-60, the federal government rejected the relevance for Senate reform of the West German experience as well as the notion of a second chamber composed of delegates of provincial governments.

In November 1980, the report of the sub-committee of the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (the Lamontagne Report) analysed in depth the arguments for a council composed of provincial delegates as well as the arguments for a Bundesrat-type Senate. It rejected both models and concluded that the intergovernmental aspects of the federation should continue to be handled by intergovernmental conferences. Its reasons were as follows:

- A council would give provincial governments a power of disallowance over certain legislation passed by Parliament. Its objectives could be accomplished in a less objectionable way, and without creating a new institution, by giving constitutional recognition to the First Ministers Conference.

- A Bundesrat-type second chamber would, in the same manner as a council, subordinate Parliament to the provincial governments: "It would give to the executive branch of the provincial order of government suspensive and absolute veto powers over the legislative branch of the federal order of government. It would make the federal Parliament a hybrid body amounting to a monstrosity."

The arguments advanced against new institutions based on the Bundesrat have clearly had their effect. Some expert witnesses appearing before the Committee admitted that they had changed their minds since first being attracted to the Bundesrat model in the late 1970s. Many other witnesses categorically opposed such an institution. A few supported the proposal in the Lamontagne Report for constitutional recognition of the First Ministers Conference. Very few now argue for a provincial role in federal legislation.

This Committee is unanimous in opposing the creation of a second chamber composed in whole or in part of delegates who would act under provincial government instructions. We feel that regional representation with respect to federal legislation should not be a function of provincial governments. A Bundesrat is appropriate for West Germany, where the provinces are heavily involved in administering federal legislation and have relatively little legislative and financial autonomy compared with Canadian provinces. In Canada, such an institution could lead to serious problems for Parliament and the federal system. We can see some merit in institutionalizing the First Ministers Conference, but take no position on it because it is outside our terms of reference.

Indirect election

In 1978 the federal government proposed a system of indirect election in Bill C-60. It explained the reasons for its choice in the paper entitled The House of the Federation. The proposal was that half a province's senators should be elected by MPs, with the MPs from each federal party electing a number of senators in proportion to the popular vote received by the party in the province in the most recent federal election; the other half would be elected in a similar manner by the province's legislators, in proportion to the party vote in the most recent provincial election. The result would be that both federal and provincial parties would be represented in the new chamber, and the chances were that no single party would ever have a majority. Bill C-60 proposed that the new second chamber be given a suspensive veto.

It was argued that indirect election would achieve effective representation for the people of the provinces in a way that would not threaten the primacy of the Commons to the extent that direct election might. It was believed that because the chamber was not elected directly, it would not choose continually to frustrate government legislation with its suspensive veto.

The proposals in Bill C-60 received little public support at the time, and the Supreme Court later ruled that the most important of the proposed changes to the Senate could not be implemented by Parliament acting alone.

Only a very few witnesses favoured indirect election. Those who did generally advocated the Bill C-60 model, with minor variations. They believe that indirect election would be more politically effective than a reformed appointed Senate, less potentially dangerous than an elected Senate, and able to meet some of the objectives of a Bundesrat.

On the other hand, others argued that indirect election is more like appointment than election, and that senators would have little standing as regional representatives. As a result, indirect election would not add to the political authority of the Senate. It is not improbable that caucuses would choose friends or associates who might not be the best qualified people for the job.

It is also argued that the provincial legislatures should not be involved in federal legislation. Senators chosen by provincial legislatures would be oriented toward matters germane to provincial jurisdiction. They would therefore have a conception of their duties entirely different from what senators elected by MPs would have. Moreover, the Senate would be composed of a political pot-pourri with which a government might find it difficult to negotiate productively. The Senate could also become a house of obstruction if the party in office federally held office in few provinces.

The Committee considered these arguments and is persuaded that indirect election would not meet its principal reform objectives, which are to strengthen the Senate's capacity to fulfil the functions of regional representation, legislative review and investigation, and to increase the political authority of Parliament as a whole.

Direct election

A sizable proportion of witnesses, roughly comparable to that advocating reformed appointment, supported direct election of senators by the people of Canada.

A number of arguments are made in favour of direct election. Witnesses emphasized that only direct election would give the Senate substantial political authority. Consequently, if Senate reform is to give the people of the less populous provinces and territories a stronger voice in Parliament, an elected Senate would be the best way to achieve that goal.

Witnesses pointed out that with such a Senate, those who have territorially or culturally based interests in federal legislation and policies would have someone in the nation's capital to express their views in a direct, public and politically effective way — provided senators were not too bound by party discipline. As a result, those interests would no longer have to seek an outlet through provincial governments. That should help to remove an important source of irritation from federal-provincial relations. Inter-regional disputes about federal legislation and policies could be debated and resolved in a national forum rather than at federal-provincial conferences, which sometimes give the public an impression of constant bickering and national disunity.

Those who recommend proportional representation point out that direct election would bring better regional balance to the caucuses of the national parties, thus encouraging greater accommodation of regional views in party policies. A prime minister seeking to construct a regionally balanced cabinet would also have more choice.

Finally, those who support direct election say it works well in Australia which, like Canada, has a parliamentary system in the British tradition and is a federal country; Canada would not be introducing an untried system.

Those who oppose direct election say that elected senators would be bound to feel that they ought to exercise powers equivalent to those of MPs; this would result in a chamber that would compete with the House of Commons and endanger our system of responsible parliamentary government. It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to devise an institution that had neither too much nor too little power. If it had too much, the government would, in effect, be responsible to both houses. If it had too little, the new institution would not be taken seriously.

They argue further that it is unlikely that an elected Senate would be non-partisan, given that senators would need party support to get elected. To the extent that senators were bound by party discipline, much of the purpose of Senate reform would be defeated, because the Senate would come to resemble the House of Commons in everything but the distribution of seats. On the other hand, if senators were completely non-partisan, other problems could arise: senators might take too little account of national concerns or trade their support for parochial interests.

Opponents of an elected Senate also argue that such an institution is outside Canadian experience and that the effects of introducing it are unpredictable. They believe that the Australian experience, far from supporting the option of direct election, has revealed serious problems.

Finally, they argue that it will be difficult to get the necessary approval for constitutional amendments, and that the public is weary of constitutional disputes.

Those who favour an elected Senate and those who oppose it both recognize that a good deal would depend on how the institution is designed: the electoral system, the timing of elections, the term of senators, the legislative powers, and the distribution of seats. It seems to us that a major difference between the two sides is that those who favour an elected Senate believe that it is possible to achieve balance between too much and too little power for the Senate, and between too much and too little party influence over senators. Those who oppose an elected Senate doubt that this balance is possible and are opposed to introducing such a change because the outcome is uncertain.

Most members of the Committee consider, however, that the two most likely alternatives to direct election — a reformed appointment process and indirect election — would not give the Senate sufficient political authority; therefore they would not give the people of the less populous provinces a stronger voice or provide effective protection for Canada's French-speaking minority.

We conclude that direct election would best meet the reform objectives we set out in Chapter 4 and that a carefully designed elected Senate would achieve the necessary balance we have described. Our proposed model for an elected Senate, which has the support of most members of the Committee, is described in the next chapter.

CHAPTER 6

An Elected Senate: The Committee's Proposal

Having concluded that an elected Senate would best meet our objectives for reform, the Committee faced a wide range of choices on questions such as the method of election, the distribution of seats among the provinces, and the powers of the Senate. The choices ranged from a Senate with powers equal to those of the House of Commons and with an equal number of seats for each province, to an advisory rather than a legislative body, with a distribution of seats proportionate to the population of each province.

We tried to strike a balance between these extremes. We propose that, in due course, senators be elected for non-renewable nine-year terms by plurality vote in single-member constituencies, in triennial elections separate from Commons elections, and that the Senate have a suspensive veto of 120 sitting days over most bills. The representation of the less populous provinces and of the territories would be increased, bringing the number of seats in the Senate to 144. Legislation of linguistic significance would require a double majority vote. Before describing our proposals in detail, we shall say something about the principles that guided our choice.

It is generally acknowledged that a parliamentary system based on ministerial responsibility has served Canada well and should not be endangered. Such a system clearly works better if the government is responsible to only one house. If the government were responsible to two houses, one of which it did not control, the operations of government could well be paralysed. We have sought to avoid this at all costs. We have attempted therefore to ensure that an elected Senate, while enjoying substantial powers, will not be in a position to contest the ultimate supremacy of the House of Commons.

Another of our major concerns was to ensure that senators have the desired measure of independence. If they are perceived as purely partisan, their credibility as people speaking on behalf of regional interests will be diminished, and we will have failed to meet one of the goals of reform. In deciding on a method of election, on the powers of the Senate, and on the length of a senator's term, we have made choices that should help give senators a certain autonomy.

Finally, given that we believe it is necessary to increase the western provinces' share of seats in the Senate, it follows that the share of other provinces would be reduced. As a result, Canada's francophone community, which is located primarily in Quebec, could feel more vulnerable. We therefore propose a new voting procedure to enable senators representing that community to vote separately on any linguistic proposal of special interest to it.

The components of our model for an elected Senate are described in the pages that follow. For each we list the principal options and explain our choice. We emphasize that the components of our model are interdependent. Considered alone, each has its drawbacks, but taken together we believe they would produce a strong Senate able to represent regional interests without undermining the system of responsible government that we enjoy in this country.

The electoral system

The Committee had to choose between a majority system and proportional representation — that means, in practice, between single- and multi-member constituencies.

Proportional representation is the system used to elect the Australian Senate and most western European legislatures. Essentially, it gives each political party a number of parliamentary seats corresponding roughly to the percentage of votes cast for it. Witnesses advocated two systems of proportional representation: the single transferable vote system used in Australia and in Ireland and a list system based on the European model. Witnesses advocating proportional representation argued that the present plurality vote system (also called first-past-the-post) has resulted in a lack of regional balance in parliamentary caucuses and that minority parties in each region win few seats, if any. The present system can and does result in one of the major federal parties failing to elect a single member in any given region of Canada, which makes it impossible to constitute a fully representative federal cabinet. Proportional representation, on the other hand, would have enabled the major parties to elect candidates in all regions of the country had it been the system in use at recent elections. Some witnesses also argued that the Senate should have an electoral system different from that of the House of Commons so as to emphasize the distinction between the two houses. Finally, in a system of proportional representation, senators would be elected in constituencies the size of the provinces, and that would add to their prestige.

Opponents of proportional representation argue that if the system were used for Senate elections—and even more, if it were used for elections to the House of Commons—it would facilitate the emergence of purely regional parties. Such a development would undermine the national parties, which help to integrate and soften regional differences. Conflict between purely regional parties could increase regional tensions.

We have been impressed by this argument and have concluded that Senate reform should not stray from its true objective or serve to resolve a representation problem for which the political parties have only themselves to blame. In other words, if parties are incapable of electing members in a particular province, they should pull themselves together and change their attitudes. The electoral system should not be altered merely to compensate for the weaknesses and strategic errors of political parties. However, we should note that one member of the Committee continues to favour proportional representation.

In addition, it is apparent that electoral systems based on proportional representation are complex. While they are not beyond the comprehension of Canadians, we are concerned about public reaction to an unfamiliar and even confusing electoral system — a system that was used at the provincial level in the cities of Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton beginning in the 1920s, but that was abandoned in the 1950s. Moreover, province-wide constituencies would not allow for regional representation within provinces; for example, almost all the senators elected from a province might come from the major urban areas, leaving rural areas unrepresented.

Some people suggested that we recommend the use in single-member constituencies of the alternative vote that is used for the Australian House of Representatives. They argued that such a system gives the voter an opportunity to express a sequence of preferences among the various candidates and political parties. It also results in the election of a candidate who enjoys the support of a majority of the votes cast, although those votes might not be all first preference votes. We considered the implications of using this system. We noted that it was used but subsequently discarded in three Canadian provinces; that if introduced now it would be unfamiliar to Canadian voters; and that experience shows that election results are only marginally different from those under the present system.

By contrast, the Committee found the present single-member plurality system simple and satisfactory. Voters are familiar with the system, having used it for generations to elect representatives to all levels of government, with a few exceptions. We see a real advantage in having the senatorial election system rest on the same principles as those governing election to the House of Commons, so as to avoid confusing voters about the existence within the federal Parliament of two opposing electoral systems. There are other advantages. Having smaller constituencies electing only one senator would facilitate election campaigns. Also, the chances of linguistic and cultural minorities within each region electing one or more of their members would be greater if constituency boundaries were drawn so as to permit such representation. The application of this principle should also facilitate the election of representatives of some of Canada's aboriginal peoples.

One of our major concerns is that the use of lists in large constituencies might increase the control that party headquarters have over candidate selection. The corrective measures suggested to us seemed inadequate. The use of lists could have amounted to nothing more than the veiled appointment of senators by political parties. On the other hand, with smaller single-member constituencies, local party workers would be in a better position to have their views prevail over those of central party authorities. This would meet one of our major objectives — to give senators a broader measure of independence.

We should not conclude these comments on alternative electoral systems without noting that we were urged by a number of witnesses to take a first-hand look at how proportional representation works in practice for Australian Senate elections. It was argued that if we were to talk on the spot with politicians and others in Australia, the disadvantages we perceive in proportional representation in general, and in the single transferable vote in particular, would not seem so formidable. In any event, the time available to our Committee for its investigations and for essential travel in Canada was not sufficient to allow us to make the trip and to meet even our extended deadline. We do recognize, however, that a comprehensive review of alternative electoral systems for the Canadian Senate should ideally include an on-the-spot examination of the system used in Australia.

Constituency boundaries

While voters in each senatorial constituency would elect only one representative, as is the case in House of Commons elections, we do not believe that constituency boundaries should be determined according to the same principles of population equality. Senators should represent natural, identifiable communities. Although population should be one criterion in determining the boundaries of Senate electoral districts, greater importance should be attached to geographic, community, linguistic and cultural factors than is the case for House of Commons constituencies. In readjusting the federal electoral map, larger discrepancies in the average number of electors could be tolerated than those authorized in the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. At present Quebec is divided into 24 senatorial districts, the boundaries of which were delineated in 1856. They no longer have much relation to contemporary realities and should be abolished. New districts would be created in Quebec as in the other provinces. Senate electoral districts, like those of the Commons, should not extend beyond the geographic limits of a province or territory.

It would be necessary periodically to readjust Senate constituency boundaries. Since this task would require political judgement, we propose that independent commissions prepare proposals for constituency boundaries in accordance with criteria specified in the law, but that the final delineation be done by an act of Parliament. Parliament would then have an opportunity to amend the proposals made by the commissions. However, the initial distribution for the first elections to the Senate should be done by a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

The senatorial term and the timing of elections

We recognized that in choosing single-member constituencies we had to ensure that the role of elected senators would be quite clearly different from that of members of the House of Commons. Our proposal to restrict senators to a single term of office does this and achieves some other important objectives. If senators are not able to seek re-election they will have more independence of party influence and greater freedom to speak out as regional representatives, they will be less likely to get involved in the kind of constituency duties that would duplicate those of members of the House of Commons, and they would be able to devote most of their energies to sittings of the Senate and its committees.

We realize that senators who serve for a single term would not be obliged to account for their actions to their electors at a subsequent election. But senators, like all elected and even many appointed officials, are accountable in a variety of ways to the people they serve. Quite apart from their own motivation, there are many different social and party pressures on them to do a good job. We believe that these pressures will tend to ensure that senators who are elected for a single term will not abuse the trust of those who vote for them. We acknowledge that if the Senate had as much power as the Commons the question of re-election would assume relatively more importance. With a suspensive veto the accountability problem, while important, is less critical. On balance, therefore, we believe that the advantages of a single term outweigh the disadvantages.

It was difficult to decide how long the single term should be. Most witnesses recommended a term of six years, without any restriction on senators running for a second or subsequent term. This is the arrangement in the United States and Australia. We decided that if candidates were to be restricted to a single term, the term would have to be long enough to attract good candidates. Our preference for nine years is to allow for continuity in the Senate. With senators serving just a single term, it is important that the turnover not be too rapid. For example, if half the senators serving a six-year term were elected every three years, after any given election a maximum of half the senators would have only three years' experience in the chamber. We therefore decided to recommend a nine-year term, with one-third of the senators being elected every three years. The longer term would have the additional advantage of giving senators more independence and enough time for them to learn to be effective in their role as legislators and regional representatives.

Our recommendation to renew part of the Senate every three years follows the system used for the Senates of the United States, Australia and France. Because we would be using single-member constituencies, voters in only one-third of the constituencies in each province would be called to the polls at each triennial election. (For the territories we are recommending a number of seats that would not be divisible by three, so for them there would be special provisions.)

These triennial elections should be held separately from Commons elections and on fixed dates — for example, on the second Monday of March in every third year. A number of witnesses recommended that Commons and Senate elections be held simultaneously, with half the Senate being elected at each Commons election. They pointed out that this would result in fewer elections and could produce a higher voter turnout. One disadvantage of half-Senate elections for our model is that a senator's single term could be too short in that it would be limited to two parliaments; and it could be too long if one-third were elected at each Commons election to sit for three parliaments. But we had other objections. The Senate election campaign would be overshadowed by a simultaneous campaign whose primary object was to elect a government. Also, the power to dissolve Parliament would give the government a certain measure of control over the Senate. We believe that senators would have more independence, and more authority as regional representatives, if their elections were separate. Moreover, separate elections could well increase the chances of candidates without party affiliation running successfully. While affiliation with parties will be natural, it should not be the only way of getting elected.

The power of dissolution enables the Governor General, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, to cut short the mandate of the House of Commons at any time during the five years following a general election. By virtue of this power, elections to the House of Commons could be timed by the government to coincide with the triennial Senate elections. To prevent this, there should be constitutional safeguards.

Legal provisions governing Senate elections

Legal provisions will be needed governing such matters as who is eligible to vote or to stand as a candidate for election. These provisions should be set out in a new statute designed specifically to govern all aspects of Senate elections, including election expenses. The statute should come into force in advance of the first elections.

The distribution of seats between the provinces and territories

At present, Senate seats are divided according to the principle of four equal geographic regions — Ontario, Quebec, the Western provinces and the Atlantic provinces. The principle of equality is not followed strictly, because the four Atlantic provinces have a total of 30 seats in the Senate, compared with 24 for each of the other regions. Witnesses argued that this division on the basis of four regions is outmoded for the purposes of regional representation, that it should be abolished, and that the distribution of Senate seats should be made solely by allocating seats to each province and territory.

It was also asserted that it makes no sense for a province to have more seats than one with a much larger population, as happens now.

A number of witnesses argued strongly that each province should have equal representation in the Senate. They claimed, in essence, that equality of citizens in the House of Commons must be balanced by provincial equality in the Senate. This is the principle accepted in federations such as the United States, Australia and Switzerland, where all states or cantons have the same number of seats in the second chamber despite considerable population differences. These arguments were pressed most vigorously during our public hearings in the West and in the Atlantic provinces.

We note, however, that in none of these three federations is the imbalance between the constituent units as pronounced as it is in Canada. For example, Canada's largest province, Ontario, has about 36 per cent of the country's population; in the United States, the largest state has only about 10 per cent. In Canada, the application of the equality principle would enable the five least populous provinces — that is, those accounting for 13.4 per cent of the Canadian population — to have a majority in the Senate if they had the support of the territorial representatives, whatever their number. A resident of Prince Edward Island would have as much electoral clout as 70 Ontarians and 50 Quebecers. Such pronounced inequities could jeopardize the institution's credibility. Moreover, if this system were adopted, the only province with a francophone majority would see its relative weight in the Senate, which stood at 33 per cent of the seats in 1867 and today stands at 23 per cent, plummet to less than 10 per cent.

We therefore concluded that, while providing for substantial over-representation of the less populous provinces and territories, we should propose a distribution that reflects the Canadian reality more accurately than simple numerical equality can do. In so doing we drew upon the example of the second chambers of the West German and Indian federations, where the equality principle has been weighted on the basis of the population of each state.

For this reason, most members of the Committee favoured the following distribution: Ontario and Quebec would retain the same number of seats that they have now (24), and the other provinces would be given 12 seats each, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, which would be given 6. Yukon and the Northwest Territories would both have increased representation. This formula would produce a Senate with 144 members. The stronger role envisaged for the Senate both in regional representation and in committee work warrants a significant increase in the number of senators. In some cases our formula would give provinces and territories more senators than MPs. This troubled some members of the Committee, because they believe it could undermine the authority of MPs from those areas. However, most of us believe that an equitable division of Senate seats among provinces and territories is more important.

If our proposed distribution is adopted, it would be necessary to amend section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867, which now provides that a province is always entitled to a number of MPs that is not less than its number of senators. The section should probably be amended to say that the wording should apply only to the number of senators that a province had in 1982. Thus, Prince Edward Island would be guaranteed at least four MPs, but the number would not rise to six when the number of its senators is increased from four to six under our proposed distribution. The accompanying table compares the existing distribution of seats with the proposed distribution.

The Senate's powers

Almost all the witnesses who spoke in favour of an elected Senate recommended that the Senate not be able to overturn a government. We agree fully. In a parliamentary system, a government cannot serve two masters whose wills might on occasion be diametrically opposed.

A number of witnesses maintained that an elected Senate ought to have the same legislative powers as the House of Commons or, more accurately, that it should continue to have the powers assigned to it by the Constitution Act, 1867. The argument was made that two legislative bodies, both elected on the basis of universal suffrage, should be on an equal footing. Doubts were also raised about the quality of the candidates who would want to run for seats in a chamber whose powers were markedly inferior to those of the House of Commons. The result of this line of argument would be a Senate exercising an absolute veto over all legislation voted by the House, with the possible exception of money bills. If there were persistent disagreement between the two chambers, the disputed bill might be left in abeyance, or a joint committee composed of members from each house could try to agree on a mutually satisfactory redrafting. Some people proposed that if the disagreement persisted, a joint session of the two chambers could be held to resolve it by a majority vote; and, if that failed, both houses could be dissolved and an election called.

Thus, if the Senate enjoyed an absolute veto, the parliamentary process would become considerably more unwieldy than if it had just a suspensive veto. The government would have to be responsible to both houses. Double dissolution could mean a proliferation of elections, and the threat of dissolution could become an instrument of government control over senators. But the principal factor in our decision not to accord the Senate an absolute veto was the possibility, if not the probability, of our parliamentary institutions continually becoming deadlocked. The example of the Australian Senate, whose legislative powers are practically equal to those of the lower house, illustrates that this fear is not merely academic.

We therefore decided that it was wiser and more in keeping with the character of parliamentary government to give the Senate the power to delay but not altogether prevent the adoption of measures voted by the House of Commons. The Senate would therefore have a suspensive veto of a maximum of 120 sitting days, divided into two equal periods of 60 days. Supply bills would not be subject to any delay. The mechanism we have in mind would work as follows:

(a) Bills passed by the House of Commons would be transmitted without delay to the Senate.

(b) Within the 60 sitting days following the transmission of a bill from the House, the Senate would make a final decision on it, either adopting it, rejecting it, or passing it with amendments. If the Senate had not made a final decision on a bill within the prescribed delay period, the bill could be presented direct to the Governor General for royal assent.

(c) A bill adopted by the House of Commons and rejected by the Senate could not be presented to the Governor General for assent unless the House of Commons had adopted the bill a second time. That second adoption could not take place unless at least 60 sitting days had elapsed since the Senate rejected the bill.

(d) If the Senate amended a bill passed by the House of Commons, the amendments would be transmitted to the Commons, which would have to accept or reject the amendments. If accepted, the bill could then be presented immediately to the Governor General for assent; if rejected, the bill could be presented to the Governor General for assent only after at least 60 sitting days had elapsed since transmission of the Senate amendments to the House. At the end of the 60-day period, the House would again vote on the amendments and on the bill. This rule would also apply to bills on which the House had rejected some Senate amendments while accepting others.

(e) In computing the 60-day periods referred to above, only days when either House is sitting would be counted.

We decided to use sitting days rather than calendar days to avoid the distortions due to holidays and recesses. In practice, and depending on the time of the year, the maximum length of the delay would be between seven and nine months.

The business of supply has unique importance in our parliamentary tradition. A simple delay in voting the estimates can paralyse public administration for months. We regard this possibility as unacceptable. To give the Senate even a suspensive veto in such a vital area would amount to giving it a disguised power to overturn the government. We therefore propose that the Senate have no power over appropriation bills (including the main, interim and supplementary estimates).

At present, money bills cannot be introduced in the Senate first. We believe this prohibition should be maintained, with exceptions being made for the Senate's own budget and for bills dealing with elections to the Senate and its internal organization. In these three matters, the Senate should have the power of initiative to ensure its independence. For the same reason, it is essential that the Senate have full control over its own budget. Senators would continue to have the power to introduce bills other than money bills.

The double majority

To ensure additional protection for the French language and culture, we accept the argument of a number of witnesses that legislation of linguistic significance should be approved by a double majority in the Senate. Two methods of calculating such a majority were proposed to the Committee. One called for a majority of both francophone and anglophone senators. The other called for an overall majority of all senators that would have to include a majority of the francophone senators.

The second method would, like the first, protect the francophone minority against legislation that they believed threatened them. In addition, it might be easier to get Senate approval of legislation that the francophone minority considered desirable, because the second method would require a larger proportion of anglophone senators — if they were to vote without francophone support — to defeat it than just the simple majority of anglophones required under the first method. Since Senate rejection of such legislation could not be overridden by the Commons, there is an argument for making that rejection by the majority language group more difficult. Because the second method does that, we tend to prefer it.

Such a voting procedure would achieve its purpose only if the Senate veto on these matters were absolute. In other words, a bill or a portion of a bill having linguistic significance could not become law unless it had been passed by a double majority in the Senate. To identify those bills or parts of bills that should be subject to the double majority, it would be necessary to adopt a workable definition and a procedure for resolving disputes.

We propose that, at the time of swearing in, senators would be asked to declare whether they consider themselves francophone for purposes of the double majority.

Ratification of appointments

We believe that order in council appointments to federal agencies whose decisions have important regional implications should be subject to Senate ratification within a period of perhaps 30 sitting days. If the Senate did not reject an appointment within that period, it would be deemed to have ratified it.

Internal organization of the Senate

Under section 34 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the Speaker of the Senate is appointed and removed by the Governor General, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. The provision, probably modelled on the practice in the British House of Lords, means that the administrative management of the Senate is the responsibility of a person who may not be the choice of the majority of senators. We feel that the independence of the Senate would be increased if it could elect its own Speaker after each triennial election. This would parallel what happens in the legislative assemblies of practically all democratic countries.

The reasons that justify election of the Speaker by senators apply with even greater force to the election of the leaders of the political groups in the Senate. Those responsible for organizing Senate business should not be selected by the party leaders in the Commons. For these reasons, we believe that the government and opposition supporters in the Senate should elect their officers.

We considered the question of whether senators should be eligible for membership in the Cabinet. Some members of the Committee attached importance to the government being able to choose senators as ministers in cases where there are no members of the House of Commons of the government party from a particular province. We feel, however, that appointment of senators to the Cabinet should not be used to overcome the failure of political parties to elect representatives in some provinces. The majority of Committee members also believes that if ministers are drawn from the Senate, cabinet solidarity would prevail over their responsibility as regional representatives. We also consider that the possibility of becoming a minister and the presence of ministers in the Senate would impair the ability of senators to represent effectively the interests of their regions. We conclude therefore that senators should not be eligible for cabinet office or for a position as parliamentary secretary.

The effect of this prohibition would be to make it difficult to introduce and defend government bills in the Senate. We therefore propose — as Senate rules already allow — that ministers appear in the Senate and in its committees to explain and argue for their legislation. We believe that the rules should allow parliamentary secretaries and departmental officials to appear as well.

Witnesses have suggested that regional caucuses should be created, grouping senators from a given region regardless of their party affiliation, in order to emphasize their role as regional representatives. Such a practice would correspond with the spirit and general intent of our report. It goes without saying that participation in such caucuses should not prevent senators from attending the traditional party caucuses that are an essential part of the parliamentary process. It is there that elected senators would have a significant opportunity to contribute to the formation of party policy. Being elected, senators should have a stronger voice than they have now.

Reforms That Should Be Made Now

We recognize that our proposals for an elected Senate contain some novel features and will require public discussion. As well, putting in place an elected Senate will require constitutional amendment involving the consent of Parliament and of the specified number of legislative assemblies. All this will take time. Meanwhile, certain useful reforms to the present Senate, requiring action only by Parliament or by the Senate itself, should be introduced without delay.

The reforms we have in mind are consistent with — and would pave the way for — the elected Senate we recommend. For example, we propose two important changes that could be implemented right away: a nine-year term for future Senate appointments to replace appointment until age 75; and the more flexible use by the Senate of its present absolute veto in a way that would make it a suspensive veto. These proposals, which parallel two elements of our design for an elected Senate, are explained below.

The reforms we propose in this chapter, if exploited fully, could enable the Senate to be more effective than it is now. We must emphasize, however, that in the opinion of nearly all the members of our Committee, such reforms would fall short of enabling the Senate to fulfil its future role adequately, because only direct election can do that. Nevertheless, in the interval before an elected Senate could be put in place, the operation of the reformed chamber would provide the basis for assessing how much more effective an appointed Senate could be and whether our judgement that direct election is necessary is justified.

We shall describe our proposed reforms under three headings: the selection of senators and their tenure; the powers of the Senate; and the internal organization of the Senate.

The selection of senators and their tenure

Some of the most trenchant criticisms made before our Committee were directed at the present method of choosing senators: appointment by the Governor General on the advice of the Prime Minister. Some witnesses found no fault with appointment as such, but believed that the present method of appointment invites abuse. While there is broad agreement among the members of our Committee on that point, most of us do not believe that the alternative methods suggested in recent years would bring about any fundamental change. The present method, despite its faults, has resulted in the appointment of many outstanding public figures who have served Canada well. We propose that it be retained until a system of direct election is put in place, but that it be used in a way that befits what we expect will be a more effective second chamber of Parliament.

We believe that our proposed nine-year non-renewable term for future appointments, replacing what is in effect an appointment for life, would in itself have some influence on the kind of people who would be offered and might accept an appointment, and would be more acceptable to the public. This term corresponds to the one we recommend for an elected Senate.

The introduction of a fixed term would require an amendment to the Constitution. However, we understand that a fixed term of nine years would almost certainly not require the use of the general constitutional amending procedure, which involves the provincial legislatures, because it would not affect “the powers of the Senate” or “the method of selecting senators”. The amendment would therefore be within the authority of Parliament under section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The Supreme Court might hold that a substantially shorter term than nine years would affect the ability of senators to carry out their role of legislative review and would therefore impinge on the powers of the Senate, thus requiring the consent of the provinces. Such, at any rate, is our reading of the Court’s judgement in the Upper House Reference Case which, while it preceded the recent constitutional amendments in respect of the Senate, may still have some relevance to this matter. A single term of nine years should not present any problem in that regard.

At the time the Committee adopted the report (21 December 1983), out of a total of 104 seats, there were 21 vacancies. The recent practice of leaving seats vacant for a considerable number of years is crippling. The Senate cannot perform the time-consuming legislative review and investigative work through its committees with 20 per cent of its seats vacant. The Senate cannot be expected to function as a forum for voicing regional interests if there are no voices to be heard.

We believe that, as a general rule, vacancies should be filled within six months. We recommend that all the present vacancies be filled, by appointments for fixed terms of nine years, subject to an express understanding that they could be cut short by the introduction of an elected Senate.

The present composition of the Senate does not represent the social and cultural structure of Canada adequately. This is unacceptable. In filling the present vacancies, priority should be given to correcting this deficiency through the appointment of women, members of aboriginal groups, and members of cultural minorities.

The Senate cannot perform in the manner intended by the fathers of Confederation when the balance of representation between political parties diverges as sharply from current voting patterns as it has in recent years. We urge that new appointments correct this distortion.

We do not suggest any formal consultative procedure for the appointment of future senators, but we believe that such informal consultation with politicians and other community leaders as has been customary in the past should be continued and, preferably, broadened.

The Constitution Act, 1867 requires that those appointed to the Senate have assets totalling at least $4,000. The original purpose of this requirement is no longer valid, and the property qualification is now anachronistic. The requirement should be removed by a constitutional amendment under section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Witnesses have pointed out that most of the work of the Senate is carried out by a minority of its present members. It was also suggested that being a senator should be a full-time job. Several witnesses argued that attendance rules and conflict of interest guidelines should be strengthened, and that there should be pension arrangements for senators comparable to those available to other parliamentarians. We see merit in these suggestions and propose that a special committee of the Senate be established to consider the issues and make recommendations. Such recommendations would apply to senators who are appointed. Upon introduction of an elected Senate, the rules and guidelines should be reviewed.

Powers of an appointed Senate

At present, the Senate has powers equivalent to those of the House of Commons, except with regard to money bills and constitutional amendments. Although a money bill can be rejected by the Senate, it cannot be introduced in the Senate. Constitutional amendments require the assent of the House of Commons, but the Senate's assent is not required if the House re-passes the relevant resolution after a lapse of 180 days following its first passage. The Senate therefore has only a suspensive veto over constitutional amendments.

With the exception of constitutional amendments, the Senate's consent is required before any bill, including a money bill, can become law. This requirement is commonly called the Senate's absolute veto. We have already noted that the Senate has been increasingly unwilling to use that veto. Many people have suggested, however, that an appointed Senate would feel less inhibited about using a suspensive veto, and that if it did, senators would be able to play a more important and useful role in their review of legislation emanating from the House of Commons.

We agree that a suspensive veto would be a more suitable instrument in the hands of an appointed Senate than an absolute veto, and would probably be used. We also believe that the availability and occasional use of such a veto would help to facilitate the transition from an appointed Senate to an elected Senate, where a suspensive veto is likely to be used more readily.

The Senate's present absolute veto could not be converted to a suspensive one without a constitutional amendment involving the use of the general amending procedure, because such a change would affect the Senate's powers. However, it has been suggested to us that the Senate, without diminishing its constitutional powers, could adopt a procedure for the more flexible use of its veto, a procedure that would have the effect of making it suspensive.

This procedure could work in the following way. The debate on any bill in the Senate could be adjourned to a subsequent date on the motion of any senator, provided the motion was approved in the debate that followed. Such a procedure is already allowed under the Rules of the Senate. An adjournment of the debate would give notice to the government that the Senate wanted time to negotiate changes to the legislation. If the points at issue were resolved, the bill would be brought back for completion of debate and ultimate disposition. The Senate would, of course, have to approve the bill before it could become law.

This procedure would work best if everyone, in both houses of Parliament, understood the rules: that is, the circumstances in which the procedure would be invoked, the length of the delay for different kinds of bills (if the delay is not to be decided separately for each bill), and other relevant matters. These rules could be incorporated in the existing Rules of the Senate or, with more formality, in a federal statute requiring the consent of both houses. Although a statute would not bind the Senate constitutionally, it would have the advantage of signifying that the procedure laid down was acceptable to both houses.

The use of a suspensive veto would supplement rather than displace what is called the pre-study procedure. Pre-study is a most useful arrangement whereby the Senate can begin its consideration of the subject matter of a bill before it has received third reading in the House of Commons, thereby giving the Senate legislative input without formally amending the bill and without risking confrontation. The Senate achieves this input by communicating its views to the House informally. Pre-study should be continued. Its use with regard to any particular bill could give additional time to resolve differences with the Commons, thus making unnecessary any resort to a suspensive veto. In an elected Senate of the kind we have proposed, pre-study would become even more important because the time for the Senate to dispose of a bill would be limited.

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, in its Fourth Report to Parliament of 1980, recommended that "All subordinate legislation not subject to a statutory affirmative procedure" (that is, not actually affirmed by both Houses before it can come into effect) "be subject to being disallowed on resolution of either House and that the Executive be barred from re-making any statutory instrument so disallowed for a period of six months from its disallowance". The Standing Joint Committee believed that such a procedure, which would require legislation to put it in place, would act as a salutary check on the quantity, complexity and legal effect of regulations and other subordinate legislation.

This recommendation of the Standing Joint Committee was adopted in the Lamontagne Report on Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution, 1980, because the new procedure could give the Senate a powerful instrument for protecting the rights of citizens. Although both houses would have the same powers with respect to subordinate legislation, the Senate, being more independent of the executive, would be more likely to use them. When an elected Senate is established with a suspensive veto, its power to disallow regulations should also be suspensive.

A number of witnesses told us that the Senate could perform a particularly useful role in reviewing subordinate legislation. We are also advised that the Australian Senate has had considerable success in doing this. We concur with the recommendations of the Standing Joint Committee and of the Lamontagne Committee, for the reasons they advanced. As to the reasons advanced by the Lamontagne Committee, we recognize that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms has since been entrenched in the Constitution, but we imagine that from time to time subordinate legislation is likely to contain measures that escape the ambit of the Charter but impinge unnecessarily on the rights of average Canadians.

Internal organization of the Senate

By virtue of the Constitution Act, 1867 the Speaker of the Senate is selected by the Governor General. It would be more in keeping with a Senate that enjoys some measure of independence for senators to elect their Speaker. This would be consistent with our proposal for an elected Senate. We therefore recommend that the Speaker be elected and that Parliament pass the necessary constitutional amendment to permit this.

It would help to improve the present and future functioning of the Senate, and to prepare it for the changes that will come with election, if senators were given forthwith, both in Ottawa and their home provinces, services and staff comparable to those available to members of the House of Commons.

We have already noted that the Senate's standing and special committees perform a valuable and necessary role in Parliament. Aside from their legislative review function, in recent years they have investigated significant social and economic issues. The Senate should continue to make extensive use of its investigatory power, and it should be assured of the necessary funds for this purpose. If the Senate were to investigate matters that provoke inter-regional controversy, that would be both useful and appropriate for a body whose principal future role should, in our view, be regional representation.

A number of witnesses pointed out that Senate investigative committees could often assume tasks given to royal commissions and other bodies, at less cost and with the additional benefit that standing committees can follow up on the implementation of their recommendations. We urge that consideration be given to using Senate committees wherever possible.

Some witnesses who advocated the establishment in the Senate of cross-party caucuses for each province and territory argued that there was no reason to wait until an elected Senate is put in place. It is our view that attendance of senators at such caucuses would not be inconsistent with their continued participation in traditional party caucuses.

The transition to an elected Senate

The reforms just described are desirable in themselves, and they should help to ease the transition to the elected Senate that we are recommending—one in which senators would have a good measure of independence of party and whose primary function would be regional representation. The nine-year term, the suspensive veto procedure, the review of subordinate legislation, the election of a Speaker, the activity of investigative committees, and the establishment of cross-party regional caucuses should all contribute to the achievement of these longer-range objectives.

Some reforms would have to be deferred until senators are elected, either because they are more appropriate for an elected Senate, or because they would require the use of the general constitutional amending procedure and could not therefore be implemented quickly. These include a redistribution of what will be a larger number of Senate seats among Canada's provinces and territories, the introduction of a double majority voting procedure for bills of linguistic significance, Senate confirmation of certain federal appointments, the election by the Senate of its own house leaders, and an arrangement to give the Senate control over its own budget.

One important issue remains. How should elected senators replace the senators who have already been appointed until age 75 or for life, and how should the government discharge its obligation to those senators who have to retire?

The constitutional commitment by the government to those senators appointed for life or until age 75 is undisputed. Clearly, any senator who is obliged to resign before the end of his or her term is entitled to appropriate compensation. If, under a phasing-in arrangement, a question arises as to which senators are retired first, every effort should be made to take account of the preferences of individual senators, and the same terms should apply to all.

With regard to the transition to an elected Senate, there are, broadly speaking, two alternatives. All appointed senators could be retired together; or elected senators could be phased in, in three groups, with the result that, for a period of six years, appointed senators and elected senators would serve together.

Under the first alternative, all appointed senators would be retired together, with appropriate pension arrangements. Senate elections would be held in all constituencies to return a full complement of elected senators; but one-third of the initial group of senators from each province would serve for three years, one-third for six years, and one-third for nine years. There would be a special arrangement for the territories, where the number of Senate seats would not be divisible by three.

Under the second alternative, only one-third of the senators for each province would be elected at the first senatorial election. The choice of which constituencies would elect senators at the first, second and third Senate elections would be made by the body entrusted with drawing the constituency boundaries. A sufficient number of appointed senators would be retired, or vacancies would be left unfilled, to make way for the elected senators who would assume office at each election.

If there were 144 seats in the new elected Senate, as we recommend, this phasing in of elected senators would require the removal of fewer appointed senators in the early stages than if there were fewer seats. This figure of 144 is 40 more than the present number of seats, so that only 8 vacancies would be required to make way for the 48 senators who would join the Senate after the first election. These vacancies could arise through natural attrition, or by shortening the nine-year term of some new appointments. For the second election, three years later, 48 vacancies would be required, and a further 48 would be needed six years after the date of the first election. In the event that there were too many vacancies, we favour short-term appointments to fill them. Those appointed would not be eligible for subsequent election to the Senate.

We see some advantage in the second of the two alternatives — the phasing in of direct elections. We believe that the Senate could benefit considerably during the transition period from having a number of members who had already served for some time and who could continue to bring their experience to the chamber's deliberations.

The question may be asked: if a system of direct election is not established, should the term of those senators who have already been appointed for life or to age 75 be shortened? We believe that this question should be addressed if and when it becomes clear that an elected Senate is unlikely to be put in place. It may, however, be noted that the turnover of membership in the Senate has been fairly rapid. From 1970 to 1980, for example, 59 per cent of the seats in the Senate became vacant. This would suggest that not many years would elapse before most senators had been appointed for nine-year terms.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—PROPOSED AUTHORIZATION—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, February 7, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to hear submissions from representatives of agricultural, fisheries, forestry and related industries; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required to carry out its mandate.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—PROPOSED EXAMINATION OF SOIL AND WATER CONSERVATION—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, February 7, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine the subject-matter of soil and water conservation throughout Canada;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 7th February, 1984, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Honourable senators, the plan for next week is to sit on Tuesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon at 2 p.m., leaving Wednesday afternoon free for meetings of committees.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX EVASION—PUBLICATION OF LIST—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate which has to do with the announcement by the Department of National Revenue of the publication and circulation of a list of 107 persons or firms which had been convicted of income tax evasion between March and September of 1983. I do not object to that at all. The same list, however, contains the names of all persons and firms acquitted of tax evasion.

My question is: Is it the policy of the department—and is it going to be the policy of this government with respect to any kind of offence—to publicize the names of those persons who are not guilty of offences?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not aware of any such policy. The only possible reason I can think of for publishing the name of someone who has been acquitted of an offence is to make it clear that that person has been acquitted. That, in turn, would be irrelevant unless the public knew he was charged in the first place.

Honourable senators, I will obtain a more specific answer. I hope that that is not the policy of the department because I share the concern that is implied in Senator Nurgitz's question.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

PROPOSED TASK FORCE ON YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is also directed to the Acting Leader of the Government. It has to do with the suggestion of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce that the federal government consider establishing a short-term task force to examine the youth unemployment problem. I do not usually agree with the establishment of task forces, since I believe that any problem of the country should be dealt with by the people's representatives sitting in Parliament. Is the acting leader aware of any move toward the creation of such a task force?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received no specific information about the establishment of such a task force. I share with Senator Marshall his concern about this serious problem. When seeking the information, I will also inquire about the action that could be taken by Parliament, rather than by a task force, as Senator Marshall has suggested.

Senator Marshall: Recently, I read of a good idea promoted in one of the newspapers. The Thatcher government, in the United Kingdom, has introduced a youth training initiative whereby all those leaving school at the age of 16, and most unemployed 17-year-olds, are guaranteed on-the-job training. Perhaps this is something that the federal government should be seriously considering.

While the acting leader is inquiring into the establishment of the task force, perhaps he could mention this idea. The Canadian government, it seems to me, should be doing more to prevent the waste of our youth. There are young people who, over the last decade, have not even known what it is to have a job. Perhaps the acting leader could bring this serious situation to the attention of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who seems reasonable in his approach to many unemployment problems.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I know that the minister responsible is very concerned about the problem outlined by Senator Marshall. I do not know whether he is aware of the program initiated in Britain. I will see to it that Senator Marshall's comments are drawn to the attention of the minister.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

PUBLICATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT INVESTMENTS IN PROVINCES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question that I should like to direct to the Acting Leader of the Government. The Department of Regional Industrial Expansion has recently issued a news release, part of which gives a list of federal government investments in Quebec, as announced since March 1983. My question is as to the purpose of this announcement. Is it the intention of the government to give corresponding figures for the other provinces?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will try to get an answer to that question.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on January 19, concerning highways.

Although construction, upgrading and maintenance of provincial highways, including the Trans-Canada Highway, are a provincial responsibility, Transport Canada has demonstrated its willingness to share this responsibility through negotiated individual cost-sharing agreements with the provinces. Specifically, Newfoundland has received, through the Canadian Newfoundland Primary Highway Strengthening Improvement Program, assistance in excess of $95 million.

Under the Road Construction Program implemented as part of the Special Recovery Capital Projects Program 1983-86, the federal government is providing $35 million of the $44.5 million program. While having limited impact on the Trans-Canada Highway, it illustrates the level of present federal government funding of road construction activities in Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, I have not worked out the percentage, but the amount is $35 million of a total of $44.5 million. That is the federal government's contribution.

An agreement in principle—and I believe that Senator Marshall was particularly interested in this aspect—was reached between the Minister of Transport and the Newfoundland Minister of Transportation on December 6, 1983.

Accordingly, an economic regional development agreement and a transportation sub-agreement are presently being developed by officials of both governments to replace the current financial envelope concept. These agreements will provide future funding for support of highway construction and road development in Newfoundland.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been asked by Senator Argue to provide an answer to a question asked of him by Senator Roblin. I believe that he wrote to Senator Roblin about it. Senator Roblin's question concerned a Canada Grains Council report dealing with the proposal for an income insurance program. That proposal was contained in the final report of the Grain Production Committee to the Canada Grains Council.

Senator Argue is unable to be present today and he has therefore asked me to make that report available. I have two copies of it. It is not a private report, but an internal one, and I am told that that is the reason it is not in both official languages.

I suggest that I table one copy and give Senator Roblin the other. The report is fairly lengthy, and I do not think we should incorporate it in the record until we have at least received a response from Senator Roblin. If it appears that part of the report should appear in the record of today's proceedings, then that could be done. Therefore, honourable senators, I table:

Document entitled: "A Strategy for Expanding Grain Production in Western Canada, Final Report of the Grain Production Committee of the Canada Grains Council", dated April 1983, being a reply to Senator Roblin's question of January 31, 1984 (English text).

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVES

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on December 20, Senator Asselin asked questions concerning the Prime Minister's peace mission. He asked particularly for information on the responses to the Prime Minister's proposals to the various states. I have been furnished with the following answer.

The Prime Minister has stated that none of the five nuclear weapons states has rejected the proposal for a meeting of the five nuclear powers. Three of the five—Great Britain, France and China—have maintained that there should be certain preliminary steps, including substantial reductions by the two superpowers of their nuclear arms, before a five-power conference to limit all strategic nuclear arsenals should be held. The United States has expressed general interest in such a conference at a future date.

[Senator Frith.]

As the Prime Minister has not met with Soviet Leaders there has been no Soviet response to this idea, although the Soviet Union did put forth a similar proposal some years ago. The Prime Minister has suggested that preliminary discussions among the five nuclear weapons states might take place at the United Nations in New York.

Honourable senators may have heard from news reports that the East German government was very encouraging, that the Prime Minister is on his way back from Bucharest at the present time and that he proposes to make a statement in the other place on his peace initiative and his evaluation of its present standing.

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised by Senator Guay, and, in general, by Senator Roblin, regarding the Garrison Dam project. Honourable senators will recall that, subsequent to the answer I gave on Tuesday, many of the questions and supplementary questions dealt with the committee referred to in that answer.

President Reagan's proposed $53.58 million for Garrison construction in 1985 is for Phase I features only, which the United States says will not affect waters flowing into Canada. The United States divided the Garrison project in 1982 into Phase I and Phase II in response to recommendations of the 1977 International Joint Commission report. Canada remains committed to modification of those Phase I Garrison features potentially damaging to Canada and to ensuring that Phase II as planned will never be built. At the November 21, 1983 Canada-United States consultations on the Garrison project, the U.S.A. agreed to the modification of an outlet of the Lonetree Dam requested by Canada and to the establishment of a Garrison Joint Technical Committee to examine and, it is hoped, to resolve Canada's remaining technical concerns regarding Phase I. The technical committee will also function as a much-needed early warning system to alert Canada to technical considerations regarding Phase II.

The budget presented yesterday to Congress is a proposal only, and requires Congressional approval before going into effect. The budget proposal includes the stipulation that "no construction potentially affecting Canada will be undertaken." That assurance, which refers to U.S.A. obligations under the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty, was given at the November 1983 consultations and was reiterated at the October 1983 bilateral discussions in Halifax between the minister and Mr. Shultz. Canada intends to pursue actively the technical level consultations currently under way and will use this forum to ensure to its satisfaction that the proposed appropriation is consistent with the U.S.A. commitments regarding the Boundary Waters Treaty and the Congressional stipulation "not to affect waters flowing into Canada."

In addition, I have obtained a statement regarding the meeting which Senator Guay asked about. It is too long to read but I do not think it is too long to be included in the Debates of the Senate, where it can be reviewed by those honourable senators interested in the matter.

GARRISON JOINT TECHNICAL COMMITTEE JOINT PRESS LINE

The Canada-United States Garrison Joint Technical Committee held its inaugural meeting on January 10, 1984 at the Freshwater Institute in Winnipeg. The Joint Technical Committee is the outcome of senior official level consultations held between the two countries on November 21, 1983 in Ottawa.

Attending the meeting were the Technical Committee's co-Chairmen, the Regional Director of Inland Waters Directorate at Environment Canada, and the Regional Director of Upper Missouri Region in the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation, Department of Interior. Also attending were representatives from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the Canada Wildlife Service at Environment Canada, the Department of External Affairs, and the Provincial Government of Manitoba; as well as from the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the Department of State and the State Government of North Dakota.

The Joint Technical Committee established a series of task forces which will assist the Committee in its mandate of examining Canada's longstanding technical concerns regarding Garrison Project features which could potentially damage waters flowing into Canada. The Committee also agreed on operating and reporting procedures for its work. The next meeting of the Joint Technical Committee will take place in mid-February in North Dakota.

GARRISON QUADRAPARTITE TECHNICAL COMMITTEE Terms of Reference

1. Membership

1.1 The Technical Committee shall consist of three representatives from Canada and three from the United States, including representatives from the Province of Manitoba and State of North Dakota. Each country may appoint standing alternates and one or more observers to the Technical Committee.

1.2 The Technical Committee shall be co-chaired by the Director General, Inland Waters Directorate, Environment Canada, for Canada, and by the Regional Director, Upper Missouri Region, Bureau of Reclamation, for the United States.

1.3 The Technical Committee may form such task forces as it may consider necessary.

2. Meetings and Reporting

2.1 The first meeting of the Technical Committee shall be held before January 31, 1984. The Technical Committee shall meet thereafter as determined by the co-chairmen.

2.2 The Technical Committee shall report to the co-chairmen of the Consultative Group on the Garrison Project, headed by the Assistant Deputy Minister of the United States Branch, Department of External Affairs; and the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Canadian Affairs, Department of State.

2.4 If the Technical Committee co-chairmen are unable to agree on the contents of a joint report, they shall submit separate reports to the Consultative Group and to each other.

3. Mandate

3.1 The Technical Committee shall monitor features under design and construction and examine immediate Canadian technical concerns regarding Garrison project features specified in, but not limited to, those outlined in Canada's Note No. 473 of October 3, 1983 and report their findings to the Consultative Group for consideration.

3.2 The Technical Committee shall undertake its technical monitoring and examinations by:

3.2.1 Obtaining all relevant technical information, including project plans and specifications, construction schedules, secondary sources, and information gained from on-site investigations;

3.2.2 Analyzing the technical information;

3.2.3 Reporting to the Consultative Group for its consideration the Technical Committee's assessments of (1) identified project deficiencies, and (2) technical solutions.

3.3 With regard to future phases, the Technical Committee shall monitor United States plans for future development and alert the Consultative Group to technical considerations related to whether and how to proceed with development.

4. Responsibilities

The Technical Committee shall carry out its mandate in the following areas of responsibility:

4.1 Biota Situation in Missouri and Hudson Bay Systems

The review shall be undertaken by a joint group of fisheries experts from both countries. The Technical Committee shall report to the Consultative Group on this matter within five months.

4.2 McClusky Canal Irrigation and Plugs

To monitor and examine, through on-site visits and other means, whether irrigation return flows could

- 4.6.3 Designs for the New Rockford Canal, and plans for the redirection of irrigation return flow from the New Rockford Irrigation Area to the James River;
- 4.6.4 Plans for redirecting return flows from the Warwick-McVillie Irrigation Area to Devil's Lake;
- 4.6.5 Plan for construction of the Oakes Canal and Taayer Reservoir.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): I want to be clear in my understanding of my honourable friend's statement with respect to this matter. He gave us what I thought was an encouraging report on Tuesday, that the Joint Technical Committee had in fact been set up. I take it from what he has just told us that any expenditures contemplated under this $53.6 million appropriation now being sought will in fact be reviewed in advance by this technical committee. Is that correct?

Senator Frith: The date of the meeting about which I am furnishing particulars was January 10. I suggest we all look at that since it is my understanding it is a part of their duty.

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: I take it that, unless my honourable friend tells the house something different, my interpretation of what he has said is correct.

[Senator Frith.]

My second point has to do with the question of public information. Has the Acting Leader of the Government made any progress in his search for some policy decision from the government as to what form of public exposure will be given to the conclusions of this technical committee?

Senator Frith: Yes. Of course, part of that request was granted today when I asked for more public information with regard to the meetings of that committee. Whether it is the intention of the government to continue furnishing me with information as to the progress and proceedings of that committee, I will endeavour to find out.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would like to make a further comment on this matter. I wish to point out to my honourable friend that it would be to the public's advantage if there was a clearly stated policy with respect to the disclosure to the public of the decisions taken by this technical committee. I wish to give a reason for making that statement.

I am aware that the United States Congress on all suitable occasions has stated that it will not do anything that would be deleterious to the province of Manitoba. It seems a bit churlish to question that well-intentioned assertion. However, over the years we have found that there is some difference of interpretation between the people on the one side of the border and the people on the other with respect to what constitutes an improper trespass upon the rights of Canada concerning this watershed.

The question is: What do they mean by that statement? There is no use in trying to elucidate the matter here; but it illustrates the need to reassure the public, particularly in the province of Manitoba, that matters are progressing well. I think the public should be encouraged by what we have heard thus far. However, in view of the difference of opinion as to the meaning of words with respect to the undertakings of the American government, I think it would be highly desirable to hear from the technical committee about what decisions it has taken, particularly if there is any disagreement with respect to the facts.

I stress this point, because I would be reluctant to depend upon catch-as-catch-can disclosures of information to this house or elsewhere about this matter. I would be much happier if we had a clear statement of policy on how the government intends to deal with public relations in respect of this matter.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I understand it the concerns mentioned by Senator Roblin are the exact concerns of the technical committee. I agree with his point that the government and the committee should keep the public aware of how the committee is monitoring the implementation of Phase I, how it is interpreting these questions and what issues are arising with respect to the interpretations. I will pass Senator Roblin's comments along to the government. This has been a very good first step today. Senator Roblin's point with respect to keeping those who are more directly concerned informed is a point well taken and one which I will see is drawn to the attention of the authorities.

Senator Roblin: I do not want to beat this matter to death. However, I am really not happy with my honourable friend's suggestion that he will report the views that he and I share in respect of this matter. What I really want from him is a statement of the government's policy with respect to information on the matter. I wish to underline this point in order that he will understand what it will take to satisfy me.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, what we are hearing today is the same old story we have heard in the past. The only difference I notice today is that my acting leader is agreeing with the Acting Leader of the Opposition. I am a little surprised at that, but I am not satisfied with the answer he has given and I will tell honourable senators why. Over the past few years, going back to 1976 at least, there has been a request for an allocation of funds from Congress. I recall that just two years ago it was $5 million; but last year it was $22 million and that also had to be approved by the congressional committee. They are spending millions of dollars and yet they keep saying, "We have not finished Phase I."

Now we are told today that there is a request for approval by the congressional committee of a further $53 million. If that approval is given, it will mean that again this year large sums of money will be spent for the ultimate aim of affecting the waters of Manitoba, although the Americans keep assuring us that that is not so. No doubt there will be jobs created by this project, but they will not be Canadian jobs.

I agree with Senator Roblin, who is also from Manitoba, that we ought to get a statement, not only from the government but from the International Joint Commission. They have been studying the matter now for the past five years and it is surely time for them to come out and say that they agree or disagree with what has taken place or what is intended to take place. It is important to know what is happening in this area, because if I go back to Manitoba and tell the people involved that the Americans are asking for congressional committee approval of a further $53 million for this project, I might just as well keep quiet because I know what answer I will get.

I think it is important to know what the position is, because, while we are waiting for a definite answer, the Americans are spending millions of dollars every day to improve the Garrison.

Senator Frith: I am somewhat disappointed in what Senator Guay has said. However, when I started the answer, I do not think that Senator Guay was present in the chamber so he may not have heard the first part of my answer. I am also sorry that Senator Guay is still disappointed, because, even though he asked me only on Tuesday last to obtain information about the meeting of that committee, I produced it before 3 o'clock on the next day. Rather than reproach, I am slightly disappointed that I did not receive some praise. However, that goes with the territory—

Senator Guay: I should congratulate my friend.

Senator Frith: On the first point made by Senator Guay, I suggest that, when he goes back to his countrymen in Manitoba, he should point out that the $53 million in the present Garrison budget is accompanied by a statement that none of that money is to be spent for any projects that have any effect on Canada. That may be the part of my answer that Senator Guay did not hear because he has just arrived.

The question then, of course, is: How do we know that it will not affect Canada? That is where the committee comes in and that is where Senator Roblin comes in. That is why I agreed with Senator Roblin, when he said that it should be continually made public that the $53 million will not be used for anything that is deleterious to Canada, and this committee is there to ensure that it is not. I suggest that Senator Guay may find, when he reads my answer, that he can return to his colleagues in Manitoba with some happier news than perhaps he has done on previous occasions.

Senator Guay: I have a supplementary. First of all, I would like to congratulate my acting leader for his promptness in giving us an answer of some kind.

Senator Roblin: Don't go too far, Joe.

Senator Guay: However, I would like to ask him a question. What will the committee do if congressional approval is granted for the $53 million that has been requested? Will the committee's recommendation delay or amend something that has been approved by Congress? If I could have that assurance, it would change my mind slightly—provided that the committee did not delay so long that the work for which this $53 million was approved had begun. Every year we have a similar answer.

Senator Frith: No, that is not true.

Senator Guay: I do not think that Senator Frith can say that it is not true. He cannot tell me that the Americans did not spend the $22 million which was allocated last year. They had money approved last year and the year before that, and that money was spent on an annual basis. They are now asking for $53 million and, notwithstanding that congressional approval has not been given, that committee has been struck and that amount of money will be spent on the Garrison Dam project. If the spending of that money will affect Canada in any way, shape or form, then I would appreciate knowing that. The committee has been very slow, and the reason I am arguing today is that I am hoping that the committee will be as quick to respond as you have been. If that is the case, I will congratulate both of you.

• (1430)

Senator Frith: Let me say it once more.

Senator Roblin: We will take it as read.

Senator Frith: The committee is not going to be established to say that the appropriation cannot be spent, because the appropriation is for Phase I, which involves expenditures that do not affect Canada. What the committee will do is ensure that none of those expenditures will affect Canada because they will be available only for Phase I.

Senator Guay: Obviously you did not see the plan.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (GERALD HARVEY FUDGE AND AUDREY MARIE SAUNDERS)—ORDER STANDS UNTIL LATER THIS DAY

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Gerald Harvey Fudge and Audrey Marie Saunders".—(Honourable Senator Leblanc).

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I ask leave that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day following the second reading of Bill S-3. That will allow me to make my remarks on Bill S-3 first.

I ask leave because the couple named in Bill S-3 were the first to approach me to sponsor a bill, so I should like that bill to be the first to which I speak.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (LOUIS PHILIPPE NADEAU AND MARIE THÉRÈSE RITA BRULÉ)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-3, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Louis Philippe Nadeau and Marie Thérèse Rita Brulé.

He said: Honourable senators, it seems appropriate to begin by setting out some background for honourable senators. Bill S-3, as its title indicates, is a bill to exempt the two persons named therein from the public general law relating to marriage. In particular, it provides for an exemption from the law prohibiting marriage between persons who are related within the prohibited degrees. The general law prohibiting such marriages is addressed to two classes of related persons: the first is that class of persons who are related by consanguinity; the second is that class of persons who are related by affinity or, in other words, by marriage. The petitioners in the case of Bill S-3 are, as are the petitioners in the cases of Bills S-2, S-4 and S-5, related by consanguinity. It follows that the four bills, all of which were given first reading on December 20, 1983, raise the same questions of public policy.

It is my hope that this house will see fit to send all four bills to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, so that they can all be examined at the same time. I, therefore, propose to move second reading of each of Bills S-2, S-4 and S-5 as soon as my motion respecting this bill has been dealt with. If and when each bill is given second reading, I intend to move that it be referred to the committee.

I would also like, at this time, to advise honourable senators that I have four more petitions for private bills relating to marriage law exemptions and that it is my intention to present these petitions and introduce the related bills once the Senate and the committee are ready to consider them. This second group of bills will differ from the present group in that, in the case of the second group, the petitioners in each case are related not by consanguinity, but by affinity. Finally, I would be less than candid with honourable senators if I did not reveal to them, at this time, the fact that six more inquiries have been received from couples investigating the possibility of petitioning Parliament for private bills to exempt them from the general law on marriage and that in some of these cases the process of converting the inquiry into a petition and bill has already begun.

Honourable senators might well wonder why Parliament should be involved in the ability of two persons to marry, so I will explain. Two provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 are relevant and must be read together. The first is section 91. It confers on Parliament exclusive legislative authority in Canada over marriage and divorce. The second relevant provision is section 92. It confers on each provincial legislature exclusive legislative authority over the solemnization of marriage in the province. I can think of no higher authority than the present Chief Justice Laskin of the Supreme Court of Canada for direction on how to read these powers in the light of each other. At page 899 of the fourth edition of his text Canadian Constitutional Law, the learned judge refers to the Schepull case as authority, sufficient in his opinion, for the proposition that the legislative power in respect of prohibited degrees is within "exclusive federal competence" and that the role of the provinces in this area is to condition grants of a marriage licence on compliance with the federal prescriptions, if they see fit to do so.

Honourable senators will now understand that it is only Parliament that can be involved in the ability of these persons to marry because it is only Parliament that has exclusive competence. No one else can act in its place.

I turn now to the law prohibiting marriage between persons related within the prohibited degrees. Such law exists in Canada because, at the time of Confederation in the case of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec, and at the time of their creation or union in the case of the other six provinces, it was always provided that the laws in effect in the province would remain in effect in the province until or unless repealed, abolished or altered by the appropriate authority under the Constitution Act, 1867, which, in this case, is Parliament. Parliament has exercised its power under this heading a few times, but never to provide a comprehensive national code with respect to marriage in general, or even with respect to the prohibited degrees within which persons may not marry. The only law of general application that Parliament has passed in this area is the series of enactments culminating in the two provisions of the present federal Marriage Act, which provide that a marriage is not invalid merely because one spouse is the brother or sister, or the child of the brother or sister, of a deceased spouse of the other.

This brings us to the particular petitioners in the case of Bill S-3. Marie Thérèse Rita Brulé is the daughter of the deceased sister of Louis Philippe Nadeau and they are, therefore, related as uncle and niece by consanguinity. Both petitioners reside in the province of Quebec, so it is the law in force in Quebec at the time of Confederation that applies. That law, I am informed by the parties, prohibited, and therefore still prohibits, a marriage between an uncle and niece by reason of consanguinity. This being the case, if the parties are to marry at all, they will need Parliament's intervention in order to allow them to do so.

That point brings me to the final question I should address, which is the question of whether or not Parliament should intervene in order to allow the petitioners to marry. The petitioners point out that Parliament has acted in similar circumstances three times before, all in the past ten years. In 1975, Parliament enacted chapter 113 of the Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, allowing Richard Fritz and Marianne Strass to marry. Then in 1978, it enacted chapters 45 and 46 of the Statutes of Canada, 1977-78, allowing James Richard Borden and Judy Ann Borden to marry and allowing Eugène Waddell and Marguerite Benoît to marry.

In each of these cases, the parties were related as uncle and niece by consanguinity, although in one case the relationship was by the half-blood. In a fourth case, in 1978, the Senate gave second reading and referred to committee a bill that would have permitted Lucien Morin and Marie Rose Morin to marry, but declined to proceed further with the matter when the committee reported that, in its opinion, because the parties were related by adoption, no impediment in law existed to their marriage. It is obvious, therefore, that the petitioners have a very strong argument that Parliament has always been receptive to such petitions before and, presumably, in cases no more worthy than theirs. I, at least, am persuaded that, if we cannot distinguish between the past petitioners and the present petitioners on a rational basis, it would be unfair to do so on an arbitrary one.

On the other hand, what is new to this petition and bill, and to the other three bills that I have introduced, is that the precedents have now been established and do exist, and that the proverbial floodgates have been opened. It seems to me that, unlike the problem Parliament was faced with in the previous cases, Parliament, in these cases, must face the issue of how it wishes to deal with petitions of this nature on an ongoing basis, for now it has the knowledge that petitions in this area are no longer likely to be isolated and rare cases.

I should like to advise honourable senators that I, personally, am of the view that an amendment to the general law on prohibitions against marriage is needed. I believe that Parliament should not have to be called upon to enact a special law each time a couple requires an exemption from the now archaic general law. If any senator, therefore, wishes to propose, by way of a separate motion, that the subject matter of the general law setting out the prohibitions against marriage between related persons be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, that senator can be assured that he or she would be doing so with my full support. In fact, I am in a position to provide any senator who wishes to seek leave of the house and to propose such a motion with a suggested text.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention and now commit my motion to your care.

[English]

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have listened with great interest to the learned and eloquent dissection by the honourable senator who has just spoken, and I feel impelled to rise to my feet.

● (1440)

When I read the contents of these bills which had been placed on my desk, I found myself inclined to be repelled by them because they appeared to authorize a relationship which I thought was in its nature somewhat unnatural. As a result, I turned my mind to the attitude taken in this country towards that type of relationship.

The first word that occurred to me was "incest" so, I applied myself to the Criminal Code of Canada. There I found the definition of those with whom it is forbidden to have sexual relations. It is a somewhat limited group. It deals only with those who have a direct blood line, such as grandparents, parents and children. Such a relationship is forbidden, is classed as a crime and is incestuous.

I therefore realized that, as far as the bills before us are concerned, no question of incest is involved; but, since such bills are before us, there must be a law in this country which forbids the kind of union being sought. I took the trouble to inform myself on what that law is.

This afternoon we enjoyed a very learned exposition of the historical reasons for the law which exists—why it is in force in certain provinces and why these bills are necessarily before this body. It occurred to me that I should also make some inquiries about what law it is that these bills are seeking to avoid. I came to the conclusion—and I stand subject to correction—that it is, in fact, an offence against the common law for which there is being sought excuse.

We are dealing with the law that was in force in the various provinces which were the original partners in Confederation. When they joined, it was stipulated that whatever law was in force in those provinces at that time should be in force following Confederation, subject only to change—and no change has ever taken place in respect of the matters dealt with in these bills. As a consequence, these bills appear before us.

I also made it my business to find out what laws exist in England relating to this matter. I found out that the common law is applicable in this instance. I then set out to find out how the common law in England is arrived at in this respect. I discovered that it is arrived at in a very simple way—by using the degrees of consanguinity or affinity which appear in the Anglican Book of Common Prayer forbidding matrimony between those classes of persons. That is the law which is in effect in England, and that is the law which was adopted in Canada in 1867, from which we are now being asked to grant dispensation.

I do not believe that Senator Leblanc would advocate the passage of these bills if there were any degree of impropriety about the relationships which we are being asked to approve. I am satisfied that urgent, serious reasons must exist—whether they be considerations of age, previous relations or whatever—which impel Senator Leblanc to stand in this chamber in support of these bills. I am satisfied that they must be good reasons and that we would not be here if Senator Leblanc did not feel that they were good reasons.

Therefore, I hasten to say, in spite of anything I may have said previously, that this afternoon I do not propose to object to the referral of these bills to committee. I occupy a position—albeit a somewhat lowly one—on that committee. I expect and hope to be present when the bills are considered in committee. I may express my views at that time. I certainly do not feel that the matter should be dealt with out of hand. I do not feel that the members of this chamber can reasonably be asked to refuse to give the matter consideration. Therefore, I do not propose to vote against second reading.

On second reading, honourable senators, we are considering the principle of a bill. I do not know just what the principle is in this case. If it is a restricted matter, dealing only with those persons named in the bills, then I suppose we might say that that is the principle. However, I have listened to what Senator Leblanc has said. He has made an extremely generous offer to this house which provides any senator with the appropriate preparation the means by which to have passed a bill which would have the effect of amending the laws of Canada. That would do away with the necessity of any such matters coming before this house in future. In other words, he is suggesting that, where the relationship of aunt and uncle or niece and nephew exists, there should be no barrier to their entering into the sacrament of matrimony, and, further, that we should express our approval of this by passing these bills. Ultimately, that would mean that any person wishing to adopt this course of action in future could avoid the necessity of coming before this house to give valid reasons why an exception should be made in his case.

Honourable senators, I intended to rise to say that I was perfectly willing to see the bills go to committee, that I was perfectly willing to give consideration to them and to deal with each case on its merits, but that I would never—and I say “never” although one should never say “never”—be willing to give support, by means of silence, vote or whatever, to such a motion as that suggested by Senator Leblanc.

God knows that this chamber has come into enough disrepute amongst the people of Canada. God knows that we have heard all kinds of talk—and we will hear more of it as a result of recent proposals—on Senate reform. It would seem that the Senate is considered to be an ineffectual body, a disregarded body, a body for which the people of Canada have no real respect. Now it is suggested that the Senate pass legislation which, in my opinion, can only serve to bring this institution further into disrepute with the main body of the people of Canada. Whether it will bring us into disrepute with the main body of those in this chamber, I cannot say. Whether the House of Commons would be as easily convinced, I cannot say, either. I certainly believe, however, that this is the sort of suggestion which would, in effect, bring into disrepute in a real and definite fashion the governing bodies of this country.

Honourable senators, I am not prepared to say—and I do not say—that the relationships being sought in this case ought not to be permitted. I am not prepared to say that there may not be valid reasons for the formation of these relationships. I do not believe, however, that, as a legislative body, we should sanction and approve of a measure which can only be interpreted as an encouragement to the relaxation of the rules which have stood and which have governed our conduct for centuries. I do not know whether the basis of those rules is as much moral as anything else—certainly the moral basis appeals to me. There may be other reasons for the establishment of those rules. I reiterate that the mere passage of such legislation would, in my opinion, put the Senate in the position where it would appear to be encouraging a moral relaxation.

The greatest problem with this world today is the relaxation of all moral standards. Things which were found objectionable in years gone by are accepted today. Every day on the radio and television I hear people say, “Well, that was wrong by the old standards but we accept it today.” All I can say is that that is the process of taking things for granted; it is the process of being modern; it is the process of allowing our standards to be eroded. In my view, were we to pass this sort of bill, we would be sharing in that sort of process.

I want all honourable senators to understand clearly my position in this matter. I will listen carefully, conscientiously and fairly, I hope, to anybody who comes forward, in an individual case, to advance good reasons why he should be excused from the ordinary law. If the reasons are valid, if the case is well presented and if I can be convinced that there is value in it, then I will support it. But I will not support—and I trust that the members of this chamber will not support—the kind of act that has been suggested, which is just one further step towards the erosion of our moral standards.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have listened to what has been said by Senator Donahoe and Senator Leblanc and would like to make a couple of comments. The first is technical in nature. I believe that Senator Donahoe is quite right, in general, when he speaks about the history of the laws relating to the subject that is being dealt with in these bills. He said that the inspiration was the common law, and I suppose that would be true for New Brunswick, Ontario, Nova Scotia and some other provinces. I suppose that the inspiration in Quebec would be the civil law.

In any event, I believe that the most important point is that, unless something suffered in the translation, Senator Leblanc did not suggest that he would propose a bill—

Senator Donahoe: No, but he proposed to make the form available to anybody who would propose such a bill.

Senator Frith: I understood Senator Leblanc to say that any senator who wanted to could propose, by way of a separate motion, that the subject matter of the general law setting out the prohibition against marriage between related persons be referred to the standing Senate committee. One of the reasons for that—and Senator Leblanc can clarify this himself if he wishes—is that, when the matter arose on a previous occasion, it was pointed out by Senator Flynn and Senator Neiman that it did not seem right that the Parliament of Canada, which clearly has exclusive legislative jurisdiction in this field, require that citizens come before it requesting individual exceptions.

It seems that we can anticipate a large volume of this type of legislation, if the present situation is any indication. Although previously we have had only three such bills, we have these before us now; there are four more to come, and we anticipate a further six. The Senate could find itself back in the position it was in when dealing with legislation concerning divorces, and, in my view, we would become a body considering judicial questions rather than legislative ones. On July 23, 1975, Senator Flynn, in connection with a bill sponsored by Senator Denis, said:

• (1500)

As far as this particular case is concerned, I think there is validity to the bill;—

Senator Donahoe has expressed the same view.

—but Senator Neiman, myself and others have expressed the view that something should be done by Parliament to provide for the settlement of such cases. We should not be called upon to pass a special law in every special case.

Further, he said:

I agree that the question posed by Senator Asselin is a valid one,—

And Senator Asselin has also expressed his concern on this occasion.

—but I doubt that it should have been addressed to Senator Denis, who is merely the sponsor of a private bill. I would ask the government leader to discuss with his colleagues in the government whether there should not be an amendment, not to the Civil Code of Quebec but to all laws applicable across Canada with respect to this problem, so that it can be dealt with in a more general way in the future.

Senator Perrault, who was then Leader of the Government, said:

Honourable senators, I give an undertaking that the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition's will be brought to the attention of the appropriate government people.

Another quote that might be appropriate appears at page 1258. Senator Flynn spoke again and said:

I therefore think it is clear that the problem of those who are concerned by this bill could only be solved by way of federal legislation.

However, an important point, which I and Senator Neiman raised in committee, is that the best way to solve problems of that kind in such particular instances would be by means of an amendment made to the legislation relating to marriage by the federal Parliament. I hope that will be done eventually, and we will no longer have to be confronted by such complex problems in the future.

I believe that Senator Leblanc is suggesting that the questions raised by Senator Flynn and Senator Neiman previously and those raised by Senator Donahoe and Senator Asselin, should be referred to the committee for a proposal—not necessarily for a law sanctifying this type of situation, but for a recommendation as to a method to settle this matter other than by having the law changed and a statute passed in the case of each application that is made. Therefore, if these bills are referred to committee, I would support an additional motion that the matter under discussion, the general question, also be referred to the committee for consideration.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I overlooked concluding my speech as I would have wished. When speaking to this matter, I was advised that Senator Asselin, who is unable to be with us today, has a strong desire to express some views on this matter. Accordingly, I shall move adjournment of the debate on behalf of Senator Asselin.

In conclusion, I should say that I found the arguments advanced by the Leader of the Government quite fascinating. He said that there would be a flood of this type of legislation. All I would say is that if there is likely to be a flood of this type of legislation in the Senate, then, if we remove the barriers, there will be a much greater flood in this Dominion of Canada, for we shall see an increase in the number of such liaisons in this country, similar to what happened after we liberalized the law regarding divorce, when there was a considerable increase in the number of divorces. We are now considering giving a new lease on life to the freedom of relationships, and, in my view, I believe that we will be taking a retrograde step if we even consider changing the law in this respect.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if honourable senators feel that the views of Senator Flynn and others merit this matter's being sent to committee, then I am sure that Senator Donahoe's views will receive careful consideration by the committee.

Honourable senators, I do not mean to oppose the motion to adjourn this debate, but, if no other senator wishes to speak, I am in agreement with a motion to adjourn the debate in Senator Asselin's name.

On motion of Senator Donahoe, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (GERALD HARVEY FUDGE AND AUDREY MARIE SAUNDERS)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Gerald Harvey Fudge and Audrey Marie Saunders.

He said: Honourable senators, Gerald Harvey Fudge is the brother of Hazel Marie Mullins, who is the mother of Audrey Marie Saunders. It follows that the petitioner, Gerald Harvey Fudge, is the uncle of the petitioner, Audrey Marie Saunders. The petitioners reside in Ontario and inform me that the law in effect in Ontario prohibits marriage between uncle and niece.

Honourable senators, in my opinion this house would be well advised to give second reading to this bill for the same reasons that I proposed that it give second reading to Bill S-3.

On motion of Senator Roblin, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (ERNEST HODEL AND NORMA DORA LAURIE)—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Ernest Hodel and Norma Dora Laurie.

He said: Honourable senators, Norma Dora Laurie is the sister of Eva Emilia Hodel, who is the mother of Ernest Hodel. It follows that the petitioner, Norma Dora Laurie, is the aunt of the petitioner, Ernest Hodel. The petitioners reside in Saskatchewan and inform me that the law in effect in Saskatchewan prohibits a marriage between an aunt and a nephew.

Honourable senators, in my opinion this house would be well advised to give second reading to this bill.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (BENJAMIN JOSHEPH ANDRADE AND HEATHER WINNIFRED ANDRADE)—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-5, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Benjamin Josheph Andrade and Heather Winnifred Andrade.

• (1510)

He said: Honourable senators, Benjamin Josheph Andrade is the brother of Noel Paul Andrade, junior, who is the father of Heather Winnifred Andrade. It follows that the petitioner, Benjamin Josheph Andrade, is the uncle of the petitioner, Heather Winnifred Andrade. The petitioners reside in Saskatchewan and inform me that the law in effect in Saskatchewan prohibits marriage between an uncle and a niece.

Honourable senators, in my opinion this house would be well advised to give second reading to this bill.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an

[Senator Leblanc.]

Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Muir).

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, in commencing my remarks in this debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I should like to be among the first to welcome those of you who have recently been summoned to the Senate of Canada. I have already congratulated some of you in person, but now, formally, I should like to extend my sincere congratulations en bloc. Those new senators who are not here will read my pearls of wisdom in the Debates of the Senate when they receive their copies.

I wish for all of you good health and every success. Now that you are here I should warn you that you will be the target of all the slings and arrows of the media—as if I had to tell you that. I am sure you are aware that this is the institution that so many criticize and condemn—until they are summoned to it, to use the usual term.

It has been said, “Where but in the Senate of Canada will you find men and women with strength of character enough to lead a life of idleness?” Someone else once said that the motto of this place is, “If anyone said it cannot be done, the hell with it.” You will also hear that this is one of the few places on earth where sound travels faster than light, that among people who own windmills we are much in demand as neighbours, and that the air in this place is always full of speeches, and vice versa. To quote another wit, and I am only half correct in referring to him as that, “A man or woman gets up to speak, says nothing, no one listens and then everybody disagrees like crazy with what he or she has said.” It’s been said that a great many of us have more on our minds than there is room for and that we should have our mouths taped instead of our speeches.

Honourable senators, I spent some 22 years in the House of Commons or, as we refer to it, “the other place”, before coming here. During that length of time I used to hear all these things said about members of the Commons—and I still do.

My dear, newly arrived colleagues, you will have to get yourselves a back like a turtle to withstand the attacks of some members of the media—not all, of course. I am happy to say that there are still some who do investigative reporting; then there are others who are a few months out of a school of journalism who are assigned here to the Hill. When you read their articles you will find that they pontificate from the stratosphere. Indeed, they would have you believe that they have forgotten more than any member of this place or the other place ever knew. It would be nice if, on occasion, we would see them in the press gallery in this chamber or at Senate committee hearings.

Yes, my dear friends, you will be accused of being senile, especially those of you in your early forties. You will be accused of being lazy no matter how active you are. You will probably be told that you are as busy as a Swiss admiral. Someone may even say that your insomnia is so bad that you cannot even sleep in the chamber any more.

Of course, I have read these comments before, but they were written about members of the House of Commons.

I mentioned being active, and to those of you who have just arrived, there is plenty of activity here—if you want to indulge in it. There are plenty of committee meetings to attend. You can represent your regions well and to the best of your ability. Frankly, there is plenty to do if you want to do it. The Senate, like the other chamber, is somewhat similar to our churches, fraternal organizations and service clubs: a number of people do a great deal of work and others really do not do an awful lot, human nature being what it is.

I must mention some of the fringe benefits available to you and your guests, such as subsidized meals in the parliamentary restaurant and the parliamentary cafeterias, subsidized haircuts and shoeshines. These privileges are also available to the members of the press gallery and their guests. If you look around—oh boy!—do they have guests. But in their critiques about the members of the Senate, or the Commons, for some strange reason they do not mention that they also participate in these fringe benefits.

In your short time here some of you new senators have already come under the tongue, or pen, of the scribes—and some of it not too flattering. As the old song goes, “You’ll get used to it!”

Incidentally, some of you, especially from the Toronto area, should get a copy of the script used by that all-wise, all-knowing soothsayer and seer by the name of Stephen Lewis on station CKO. Yesterday, the same gentleman, and I use the term loosely, indicated on the air that Senator Molgat and his committee on the reform of the Senate had more or less lost their marbles. But, my dear colleagues, is it not great that we live in a country where there is still freedom of the press and freedom of speech and other freedoms? Long may it continue.

I have been in countries, as many of you here have, where no person in the media would dare go on the radio or television and say some of the things that are said in Canada. They would not dare to congregate in groups on corners; they would not dare to protest. The media would not be allowed to write some of the things that are written in Canada. However, I am truly glad that they can do it in Canada and I hope that they will continue to criticize us. In fact, I hope they will continue to do all that they wish any time they want to criticize us. It is a great form of government that we have here in Canada—of course, not the present government. It is a great system and long may it continue in this country.

Let me draw your attention, honourable senators, to an article written by Hugh Segal in the Toronto Star dated January 25. This is an article a wee bit different from the comments of Lewis. It is headed “A good 10 days for the Senate.”:

By and large, the past 10 days were good days for Canada’s Upper House. In the context both of policy matters laid before the Parliament of Canada and one or two appointments made by the Prime Minister to the Senate, the relevance and potential usefulness of the Senate has been underlined significantly.

The redraft of the government’s security legislation incorporates in it almost all of the significant recommendations made by a Senate committee in order to moderate a bill which had been poorly drafted in many respects. Now before Parliament, this is a piece of legislation that can serve to create an appropriate civilian security agency which can serve the interests of the country without in any way subverting the basic elements of our democracy.

I am not quite sure that I agree with all that he has said, but in any event he is making the point and I quote him again:

The original legislation that was put before the Parliament was ham-handed and would have caused far more difficulty than the problems it sought to remedy. The new legislation is a triumph of moderation and, while there may be significant changes yet to be made at the committee stage, it is a far better piece of legislation for the solemn, sober and careful assessment which the Senate committee provided.

Then he goes on to talk about Senator Grafstein, one of the new members summoned to the Senate. He says:

Two of the appointments made to the Senate are also particularly uplifting. Torontonians will know that the appointment of Jerry Grafstein constitutes the appointment of a loyal Liberal who, despite that one fundamental flaw in his reasoning, is an accomplished lawyer in communications, broadcast and entertainment law, and a significant spokesman for different policy and political concerns. He will be an ornament to the Senate and a strong voice for Metropolitan Toronto and, in that sense, the Prime Minister chose well.

The article concludes by saying:

Hugh Segal is a former senior aide to Premier William Davis.

This type of comment coming from someone with his background is important, I think.

He then goes on:

For those who had the opportunity of being part of the constitutional development, the appointment of Michael Kirby from Nova Scotia is of particular significance.

And he then relates all of the attributes of Senator Kirby. Further down, he says:

Moreover, in the case of both Grafstein and Kirby, the Senate was by no means the only option that they had before them in what have been significantly successful and dynamic careers. But because it is an option that they did choose to accept when offered, they have made a commitment to public service and to an enrichment of the legislative and political process from which all Canadians will benefit.

He finishes by saying:

The courage to take a political stand should by no means disqualify those of genuine competence . . .

I would like to talk a little more about some of our new appointees. I have here an article from the Toronto Sun of January 17, 1984 by Barbara Amiel, and she says:

In describing Toronto's new Senator Jerry Grafstein, one paper summed up his career with the terse line 'Toronto Liberal communications strategist.' The wire story described him as an advertising executive. The mind boggles.

Jerry Grafstein, in spite of the bizarre fact that he is a Liberal, is the kind of man who sums up the best qualities North America can bring out in a man. To dismiss a life that has been devoted to public service, is to devalue not only the man but the tradition that helped create him.

Barbara Amiel then goes on in great detail with respect to Senator Grafstein, outlining a great many things that I never knew about him. I have one little quotation here I would like to read:

There is a quality in Grafstein to which no one who has met him can remain oblivious: He is a deeply moral man, a man of genuine conviction—and a man with that rarest of qualities: Generosity. He came up the hard way and has not forgotten.

Further on, she says:

Even Pierre Elliott Trudeau ought to be allowed to appoint his friends and supporters to appointed positions—like the Senate. Most people when in a position to hire or reward someone, would prefer to give the benefit to a friend. This is not for bad reasons. Friends are usually people with whom one shares certain values and philosophy.

In any event, honourable senators, from what is said here, if I were Senator Grafstein, I would be a little worried. I had ten years in municipal politics and now I have been in the federal end of politics for almost 27 years. If I had as many nice things written about me as have been written about him here, I would be a little concerned as to whether I was going to survive in this dear old world much longer. However, I say to Senator Grafstein that he should enjoy it, because he will have a lot of other things written about him.

The new arrivals will soon notice, from listening to their colleagues on the government side, that there are two sides to every question, and the thing for you Grits to do is to defend both. It is good, however, that you are here. With only 55 Liberals and 23 Conservatives, things were getting dangerously out of balance.

It would also appear that there is now absolutely no danger that anyone will take the subject of Senate reform seriously. I know what a blow this will be to some of my colleagues, especially Senator Roblin and Senator Frith who are championing at the bit to get out on the hustings. Just a day or two ago, Senator Molgat tabled in the Senate his interim report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate; I have a gut feeling that they will not be able to run for this house for some period of time yet. In that event, I presume Senator Roblin and Senator Frith have given great thought and serious consideration to the choice of constituency in which they will seek a nomination so that they will be able to run for election to the House of Commons, which election, I hope, is not too far in the future.

With regard to Senator Sinclair, if he is not interested in running for election, I am sure he could always go back to the Canadian Pacific and his honest job as brakeman.

Senator Roblin: Brakeman he was not; anything else but that.

Senator Muir: I am sure Senator Sinclair understands what I am saying. He needs no defence. He can take care of himself, I am sure.

With regard to Senator Kirby, with his vast knowledge of the fishing industry, if he did not want to run for election, he could go back fishing. I am sure some of the in-shore fishermen would love to take him out fishing.

Returning to the subject of being summoned or appointed to the Senate, there are now 12 vacancies in this house. Because of the numerical imbalance which now exists between the parties, I would like to appeal to the fair play, intelligence and sportsmanship of the Prime Minister to fill at least 75 per cent of those seats with people of Conservative persuasion. Having said that, however, I do not plan on holding my breath.

Let me say that I know why most of you new appointees are here. I presume the Prime Minister said, "If I were to give you the opportunity to run as a Liberal in the next federal election, what would you do?" I have no doubt that you all answered, "Ask for another opportunity."

However, I do want to welcome all the new senators and explain about the prayers that we say before each of our sittings. Those prayers are said, not that God will watch over our deliberations, but that God, having heard some of our previous deliberations, will watch over the country.

I turn now, honourable senators, to the subject for the day—the Throne Speech. The Throne Speech can best be described as pointed like the horns of a steer: A point here, a point there and a lot of bull in between. On the other hand, the Speech could be compared to a fog horn: It drew attention to the fog but did nothing to dispel it. This government, I feel, will never change. It finds trouble everywhere, diagnoses it wrongly and, invariably, applies unsuitable remedies.

This is the Speech from the Throne which the Prime Minister promised in November 1982 would represent all that was innovative, bold and dynamic about the Liberal Party, and that is exactly what it has done. This is it, folks: this is dynamic, bold and innovative, and it is as dynamic, bold and innovative as this tired, old government is going to get. This agglomeration of soporific sops, with all the imagination and intellectual content of a "Gong Show," is the best they have to offer. It is a grandiose effort signifying little other than the fact that the government has no respect whatever for the intelligence of the average Canadian.

The speech refers to "perilous times". These are, indeed, perilous times when part of being innovative, bold and dynamic is to tell us that "abundant clear water is a precious Canadian resource" and that this government "will contain and curb the federal deficit." This is what we get from a team which promised in the mid 1970s to wrestle inflation to the ground—and that is a few years ago now.

What the government is saying in this speech is that they are well up on the questions of the day, "but, for God's sake, don't embarrass us for the answers!" They have approached every question with characteristic open mouth. How can we have any patience with a government which promises, in the short while it has before the execution, to do wonders by improving fisheries, forestry, agriculture, youth, high tech, exports and so forth?

I could hardly believe it when I heard that this government was against violent crime and hard-core pornography. Isn't that wonderful? I was elated and inspired to learn that they were in favour of more Canadian content on television; in favour of visible minorities; in favour of aboriginal claims; in favour of a program of growth, opportunity, security, partnership and peace. Isn't that wonderful? Boy, is that ever being innovative, bold and dynamic!

Honourable senators, one does not have to be in Who's Who to know what's what, and one does not have to be a genius to know that "them what's the problem, ain't likely to be the solution."

This government has run out of steam; it is devoid of new ideas; it lacks direction, imagination and will; it is confused and confusing. As it flounders around clinging desperately to power, it alienates more and more of the populace.

This government has lost the support and confidence of the people. Business and labour will not co-operate because they have lost respect for the government. The government cannot be depended on because there is no consistency to its policy directions. The government simply does not know where it is going, and the Speech from the Throne proves that. If you don't believe me, read the Speech from the Throne.

Because of its depressing record, this government lacks the credibility to formulate national goals and the conciliatory approach necessary to mobilize the support required to attain those goals. Under this administration consensus became a dirty word, and confrontation a national policy. The government had no mandate to destroy the energy industry through the National Energy Program, to force Canagrex down the throats of farmers, to nationalize the east coast fishery, to fundamentally alter the taxation system through the 1981 MacEachen budget, or to destroy the Crow rate.

What faith, honourable senators, can the people of Canada possibly have in this government or in this Speech from the Throne? They have only to recall the splendid promises made in the 1980 Throne Speech. Those promises should be compared to the economic facts of life which those same people have had to suffer since. It is a sad picture those economic statistics paint of our land over the past four years. Consider this disastrous litany: productivity down 6.5 per cent; unemployment up as high as 12.8 per cent; the Bank of Canada rate reached 21.24 per cent; inflation went as high as 12.9 per cent;

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): What is the rate now?

Senator Muir: I will get to that, Senator Frith, just bear with me. Take your patience pill and I will be right with you.

The net debt doubled; 10,765 businesses went under in 1982 alone; the dollar went as low as 76 cents American; there was a net inflow of $16.7 billion in direct investment capital; and government spending increased by 84 per cent. Nothing in the 1980 Throne Speech would have led one to believe that conditions would be that bad in the four years to follow.

What was achieved can be attributed to an incredible Liberal propensity for screwing up. You know, I hate to say this, but it is a propensity almost as impressive as their ability for getting elected. If things weren't bad enough, the economic recovery—which the government recently made so much noise about—we are now told by the experts, is losing its momentum.

Inflation, Senator Frith, is down to 4.9 per cent right now, but that is not due to sound economic management by this government; that is due to a downturn in the United States inflation, a sag in world oil prices and the impact of a severe recession on price and income growth. I can remember, when inflation was high, Liberal ministers travelling across this country saying that the United States was to blame. They said that Reagan and all those other characters in Washington were to blame and it was not the fault of the Canadian government. Now that the inflation rate is going down, those same people do not say that that is what is rubbing off from the United States. We blamed the United States for the increase in the inflation rate, so why not give them a little credit because we are rubbing shoulders so closely with the fact that it is going down?

What about employment? The problem is acute and chronic. Over 11 per cent of our work force is unemployed. According to what we are told by Statistics Canada, 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. I am sure that even the Acting Leader of the Government will agree that there must be 300,000 or 400,000 more across this country who have become fed up with going to the Canada Employment Centres looking for jobs. They refuse to report because they have not had any success. They are trying to find jobs on their own, and if the Acting Leader of the Government wants to help me, I can tell him that I receive an average of five or six letters a day in Ottawa and six or seven telephone calls a day at my office in Cape Breton. Those letters and telephone calls are from people looking for jobs of any kind. They ask me to try to help them make a contact, so, if Senator Frith wants to help me, he can give me a list of jobs that are available so that in some way we can make a contact for those people. I would be only too happy to accept that list.

Over 20 per cent of our youth are without work. This is one of the most serious social problems in the country, not just for the present but also for the future. Youngsters who cannot find work, training or hope in today's economic conditions will be tomorrow's hopeless, underskilled, unemployables soured on life and bent on disruption.

What does the government do about this horrendous problem? It throws money at it to the tune of $1 billion, or so they would have us believe in the Throne Speech. As it turns out, that was just another of those shamelessly calculated exaggerations. There is really only $300 million more, but that is not the point. The point is that we do not need new "make-work" programs; we do not need new ministries; and we do not need new bureaucrats. We want to be rid of statist solutions. Big government is the problem and not the answer.

We are up to our buns in government programs to counter unemployment. We have federal, provincial and municipal programs which are meant to create jobs, spread available jobs around, forestall layoffs, retrain workers and equip youngsters with marketable skills. They are all well-intentioned, but that does not keep them from being of limited value. There are simply too many of them. They overlap and even conflict with one another. But then that is part and parcel of this government's bureaucratic approach to things.

Employers cannot keep abreast of all the damned labour market programs to which they are expected to respond, let alone find out which best suits their needs and those of their employees. The government effort lacks focus and direction. It is cluttered with programs that are very often inconsistent with the practical requirements of business.

The youth of this country want permanent jobs. They do not want cynical, shallow schemes aimed at requalifying them for UIC benefits. They want to make a legitimate contribution. They do not want "make-work" programs. They are tired of being treated like children who must be kept busy at meaningless tasks lest they become discipline problems.

All the people of Canada want is to contribute—to contribute to the full measure of their capacity. They want to be part of a renewed economic wellbeing. They realize that no government is going to supply those useful, stable, meaningful jobs which they are after. The people of Canada realize better than their governments, apparently, that the solution to this problem lies with the private sector. I have heard ministers in the other place say that the government cannot find jobs for everyone. I think that only the private sector has the capacity to put all our able-bodied men and women to work. This country is operating at only 70 per cent of its productive capacity. I think this is a scandal and an outrage. There is no reason for it other than the fact that governments, with the federal government in the lead, have acted as a damper upon expansion.

Government policy has been consistently frustrating for businessmen and businesswomen. The entrepreneurs of this country, the risk-takers who dream and strive and set up enterprises, have not been encouraged.

I have already mentioned the number of bankruptcies that have resulted in a year. They have had all sorts of roadblocks placed in their paths. They have been subjected to all manner of bureaucratic delay. The rules and regulations which civil servants have dreamed up to make life miserable for the doers of this land would try the patience of a saint.

Don't get me wrong. We have a merge of government intervention and private enterprise. But governments cannot do everything and they should not dictate and direct every movement that occurs in the country.

We must come up with policies to encourage entrepreneurs to expand and thus create jobs. We must convince the risk-takers that profit is no longer a dirty word and that this country has faith in and respects the market system. We must assure the achievers that the government will not stand in their way and that they will not be actively prevented from seeking to do more and achieving better results. The spirit that must be rekindled in this country is one of enterprise, of initiative, of self-reliance and of self-respect.

I do not see our achieving that end with this Throne Speech. This Speech is the work of the same Prime Minister who once threatened to close down the enterprise system. This Speech is the work of someone still enamoured by those debunked statist approaches to government.

Let us have no more of these cynical "make-work" programs such as the Company of Young Canadians, Opportunities for Youth, Local Initiatives Projects and Winter Works Programs with their attendant bureaucracies. I agree that they are somewhat helpful, but they provide only temporary jobs. When our youth is employed on these programs, certainly it helps to keep them going and put bread and butter on their tables, but what it really does is give them enough stamps to go on unemployment insurance. Productivity does not result from such measures.

There is no need for a new youth ministry. I am sure that Senator Hébert, who is not in the chamber at the moment, would not appreciate that, but I say it sincerely and frankly. The fact that we do have a new youth ministry is going to create some jobs but it will create those within the ministry, for the minister and the staff, and will only create another bureaucracy. What is it going to do for the unemployed?

Let us do something imaginative for a change. Let us free enterprise. Let us get governments off the backs of the producers, cease to choke with confiscatory tax rates those who are trying harder, and, for the love of God, do not drown them in bureaucratic red tape. Do not have them all considered as crooks by trying to force them into income tax situations whereby even before they go bankrupt they are threatened with going to jail.

Let us down-size government. To borrow a phrase, government has become the tail that wags the dog.

Government, in co-operation with unions and the private sector, should review all labour legislation with a view to ensuring that none of it constitutes an impediment to the proliferation of jobs. There has to be a coming together between labour and management and government and labour and the corporations. Businessmen and businesswomen, on the other hand, will have to co-operate more closely with schools in order to promote a better matching of skills and jobs.

All these things are possible, but not, I submit, while we are being governed by confirmed state interventionists. As I said, drastic situations require drastic measures. There are times when the state has to intervene for the good of the people, but not always and not in everything. State interventionists will never accept that the government that governs least is best. They want large governments. Large bureaucracies are what they thrive on because it makes them feel so important. It does not matter to them that these bureaucracies are an albatross around our necks, that they do more harm than good, that they enshrine mediocrity and ensure the evolution of a leadership not based on talent.

This Throne Speech has convinced me that there is nothing to hope for as long as these statist remain in government. They will continue to offer illusions, phoney promises and empty rhetoric. This Speech is the epitome of cynicism, of all that is sham, evil and underhanded. It has trotted out the same old goals this government has consistently failed to achieve and the same old programs that have failed so miserably in the past. As I recall, some 30 items in the Throne Speech—all of which were announced five, six or nine months ago—have now been re-introduced as new goals or programs. To my mind that is not fair and it is not right. Ministers have been flying back and forth across this country, promising to do this and that, and now those promises re-emerge as new concepts for a Throne Speech.

This Throne Speech, honourable senators, is a monument to this government's past failures, the emptiness of its promises and the contempt in which it holds the people of Canada.

I pray that we will have a new Throne Speech soon, one authored by a government with a different philosophy and approach—a philosophy and approach that will get this country back to work again. If people know they have a steady job to go to, even though in some cases they are not earning large amounts of money, there is more contentment. Our basic aim should be to provide jobs for the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Austin, debate adjourned.

PETROLEUM AND NATURAL GAS

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO REVIEW TRANSPORTATION NORTH OF 60°

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, for Hon. Paul Lucier, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, January 31, 1984, moved:

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—PROPOSED AUTHORIZATION—NOTICE OF MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Motion No. 2, standing in Senator Sparrow's name, has been replaced by the motion of which he gave notice earlier today. Therefore, on his behalf, I withdraw Motion No. 2.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 7, 1984, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(l)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, February 9, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Honourable senators, the motion is consistent with the plan we have been following for some weeks now, that of leaving Wednesday open for caucus meetings in the morning and committees in the afternoon. The plan is to continue with the same arrangement for next week and, generally, to do so unless we are faced with an extraordinary unexpected burden of work, particularly in the way of legislation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Would my honourable friend inform us as to what committees he expects will convene tomorrow afternoon?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not have that information at the moment, not having received notice. I shall try to get that information before we adjourn.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question. I am a member of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which will be meeting Thursday morning, whether or not the Senate is sitting Thursday afternoon, and I will be at that meeting. What business is there that would bring everyone here for a sitting of the Senate on Thursday afternoon? I am aware of only one committee meeting tomorrow afternoon and the Internal Economy Committee is meeting on Thursday morning. What will the Senate deal with Thursday afternoon?

Senator Frith: The Senate will sit on Thursday afternoon to deal with normal business, including Question Period and a motion which, I am advised by the sponsor, will be debated partially today. There is also the potential for debate on the consideration of the report of the Joint Committee on Senate Reform and on certain motions regarding committees, particularly one which requires the involvement of the Senate because it establishes what could be called a precedent. I think there will be plenty for us to do on Thursday.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Would the deputy leader care to elaborate on the statement he made with regard to the committee that will create a precedent?

Senator Frith: Yes, I would, honourable senators. It is a motion which was introduced by Senator Marshall on behalf of Senator Sparrow. It provides that the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee interview witnesses on any subject falling under its mandate without special reference to the Senate. I understand why Senator Marshall wonders at my use of the word "precedent" since this is something that the former Agriculture Committee did in the past. I had not noticed that this committee had taken the step to have that kind of authority. Therefore, when the motion is moved I propose to suggest that the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders consider this issue so that it can advise the Senate whether it wishes to authorize this sort of measure, and whether or not there is any danger in it.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. The employment initiatives program announced in the last budget has been an item of some controversy recently. Can the Acting Leader of the Government provide the Senate with a list of the 844 projects approved under this program and the amount of money involved in each?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall try to do so. I wonder if there is any relationship between the question asked by Senator Phillips and the question asked by Senator Roblin with regard to programs dealing particularly with the province of Quebec, and information with regard to the other provinces. In any event, I shall study both questions and try to obtain the information.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to explain that point if my honourable friend will permit. The two questions are quite unrelated. My question has to do with regional economic development. The question asked by my honourable colleague covers a much wider scope than that.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the members of the other place who support the government were asked to submit projects for approval under this program. This has resulted in large areas of the country being eliminated from the program. Have the supporters of the government in this chamber been asked to submit any programs?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the programs which are the subject matter of the question raised by Senator Phillips are of general application. I am sure that the government would welcome suggestions for job creation from any part of the country and from members of either house of Parliament. I understand that the Liberal caucus discussed this matter. I had assumed that the Conservative caucus had the same sort of discussion. Perhaps they overlooked doing so.

I assure honourable senators that the program is of general application. My information is that the government is happy to hear applications from any part of the country and that it wishes the program to be implemented in order that the problems to be addressed by the program can be successfully resolved.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, my question was very simple: Were supporters of the government in this chamber asked to submit projects for approval under this program? I appreciate the dancing around the honourable senator attempted to do; however, will he please answer the question?

Senator Frith: I understand why Senator Phillips is dissatisfied with what he describes as dancing around the question. It is because he wants to particularize the question and ignore the fact that, dance or otherwise, the truth is that the program is of general application.

With respect to whether or not any member of the Senate who is a government supporter was asked to submit a project, I do not know. I would assume that they would be included in the request to all members of Parliament in the Liberal caucus to submit proposals, and that the same would apply to the members of the opposition.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Wrong again.

Senator Frith: I am sorry to hear that. It is not too late to put it on the agenda for tomorrow.

● (1410)

Senator Phillips: Your assumption is in error, honourable senator.

Senator Frith: Yes, I understand that now. Perhaps if you put it on the agenda for tomorrow, it can be dealt with.

PETRO-CANADA

OFFICE ACCOMMODATION IN CALGARY—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, on November 17 I posed a question to Senator Olson, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in the absence of Senator Austin. My question had to do with the rental arrangements of Petro-Canada in the City of Calgary. I do not know whether Senator Austin is aware of the question that was posed on that date. If he is not, may I ask that he review the question and respond to it, in the absence of Senator Olson.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I am not the minister responsible for Petro-Canada. In the ordinary course, that question is properly the responsibility of the Leader of the Government in the Senate or his deputy, as the case may be.

Senator Balfour: That being the case, may I request the Acting Leader of the Government to review the Debates of the Senate of November 17 and perhaps indicate to me when I might expect a response to that question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Yes.

SASKATCHEWAN

WATER SUPPLY TO REGINA AND MOOSE JAW—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. R. James Balfour: On November 17 I also posed a question with respect to water supply arrangements for the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw. Senator Olson undertook to obtain a reply to that question. Would the Acting Leader of the Government take action with respect to that question?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Yes.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Leader of the Government with reference to the disturbing situation in Lebanon, which, in terms of law and order, is deteriorating and, in terms of threat to the region's peace and to world peace, is accelerating. Has he any information for this house from our embassy in Beirut or from the Department of External Affairs as to the situation with particular reference to the safety of Canadians in that beleaguered city? Also, does the acting leader have any information as to whether or not it is the Canadian government's view that the diminution of the authority of President Gemayel has reached the point where the situation is so urgent that it requires some very careful and helpful action on the part of peace-loving countries such as ours?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I asked for a report on that subject and have received the following information from the Department of External Affairs:

We are continuing to follow the situation in Lebanon with grave concern in view of the general deterioration in the situation over the past few days and the additional suffering being inflicted upon the inhabitants of that country.

We have had no reports of death or injuries among the 1,870 Canadians registered with the Embassy, most of whom are dual nationals, or among Embassy staff. Canadians are being advised to take all precautions possible in view of the obvious risks.

We are maintaining close contacts with friendly embassies in Beirut in order to have their appraisals of the situation and measures being taken to protect their nationals.

Plans are in progress to move Canadian Embassy staff to safer locations when this can be done without placing them in even greater danger. It is intended that the risks should be reduced to the minimum consistent with our responsibilities to Canadians resident in Lebanon, our general support for and the interests of those Canadians who may have close relatives in that country.

A task force has been established within the Department of External Affairs to follow the situation and make necessary recommendations on steps to be taken in the current situation.

I shall attempt to keep honourable senators up-to-date on further information as I receive it on that subject.

Senator Macquarrie: I should like to thank the Acting Leader of the Government. For further reassurance, may I ask him if his report is of recent vintage, in terms of hours? I did hear that the United States was taking something close to emergency measures. I also heard about some of the personal safety moves that the wife of one of our newsmen there had made. If he can assure me that his report is very up-to-date, it will confirm my view that our people, in fact, are monitoring the situation with care and concern.

Senator Frith: The report is dated today. I cannot tell Senator Macquarrie the hour this report was released, but it was released this day.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In an interview, the Minister of State for Youth stated that, unfortunately, she did not have any new ideas for promoting employment for our jobless youth. In view of the fact that, in the Senate, youth affairs would be dealt with by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, might it not be a good idea to have the minister appear before that committee to discuss her objectives? Perhaps that would assist in overcoming the precarious position of Canada's youth today.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the idea advanced by Senator Marshall of the Senate's taking some action to remedy Canada's unemployment situation with regard to its youth is excellent. I have some thoughts on the subject, but I should like an opportunity to develop them further before sharing them with Senator Marshall and others. I support the suggestion and hope there is a way the Senate can help.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I would not like to leave on the record the implication that the Minister of State for Youth, Madame Céline Hervieux-Payette, does not have any ideas of her own. What she said in the interview was that she was determined to consult with youth groups before making major policy decisions.

I want to assure this house that she is a vigorous minister who plays an active role in developing policies with respect to youth, youth employment and career development.

Senator Marshall: I did not say anything against the minister. As a matter of fact, the one positive thing she said in that interview was that she supports Katimavik, which is an excellent program. I do not agree with her when she states, out of hand, that in order to provide youth with employment she doesn't particularly agree with the idea to expand Canada's military. I take issue with her on that. She said that unless there is more emphasis on job skills in the military, she questions the usefulness of such a scheme. I do not see any better way for the youth of our country to learn trades than going into the military or going into some paramilitary organization. If that were the case, our youth could develop trade skills and aptitudes and could decide what their contribution to the country was going to be.

Senator Austin: The Honourable Madame Hervieux-Payette has indicated an interest in the use of military training for youth career development, but her concern, and my concern, is the problem of access for trained people from that system to the trade positions within the provinces. There is much work to be done to ensure that training done within the military is accorded apprenticeship levels or journeyman levels that are appropriate in provincially regulated activity. Those are discussions I am sure she will be pursuing.

Senator Marshall: That is why I suggested in the first place we bring this matter to the attention of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. I suggested that so we could obtain ideas from the various regions of the country. Many senators have good ideas and I believe that they could contribute meaningfully to the solution of this problem.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a follow-up question to that raised by my colleague, the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, respecting the situation in Beirut.

When the acting leader replied to Senator Macquarrie, he said that officials in the Canadian embassy were consulting with other embassies in that city to determine what should be done with respect to the protection of Canadian nationals. It seems to me that the biggest difficulty facing Canadian authorities is to provide some form of protection for our nationals. I suppose it is also fair to say that we have no means of bringing that about by ourselves.

I am wondering whether this consultation with other countries, many of which will be in the same position, will result in a common policy for the rescue or the protection of foreign nationals in Beirut among whom Canadians would be included. It seems to me that we are facing an anarchic situation there. The death toll is running very high and we are pretty lucky that we have not lost anybody yet.

What initiatives can the government suggest as to how, perhaps collectively, other nations in a similar position would proceed regarding the safety of our nationals in that territory?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, according to the information I have already referred to, close contacts are being maintained with friendly embassies in Beirut in order to have their appraisals of the situation and measures being taken to protect their nationals. The implication is that the concern of all these embassies maintaining close contact will be to co-operate for the purposes mentioned by Senator Roblin. This exchange between him and me will be drawn to the attention of the department in order to ensure that my assumption is correct.

Senator Roblin: The initiative sounds useful to me, but it talks about protecting their nationals and I am particularly interested in knowing what we are going to do to protect our nationals. It is that aspect of the matter that I would like my honourable friend to investigate and perhaps report on to us at our next sitting.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the implication that the concern is for the protection of their nationals, I assume, is for the co-operative purposes we have been talking about, but we will endeavour to find out.

Senator Roblin: My question is: What are we doing?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it seems to me that some of you were not listening, when I read from the report, and for your benefit I will repeat it. In part it states that we are continuing to follow the situation in Lebanon with grave concern in view of the general deterioration. We have had no reports of death or injuries. We are asking Canadians to take all precautions possible, and are maintaining close contacts with friendly embassies to see what they are doing in order that co-operative activity can take place for the protection of all nationals that are represented by those embassies.

If there is anything that can be added to that, it will be added on Thursday.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LTD.—PETRO-CANADA—PRIVATIZATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development. Can the minister responsible for the CDIC confirm that a portfolio is being developed on Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. with an eye to privatizing that company?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I should like to confirm that I have asked the directors of the Canada Development Investment Corporation to analyze Eldorado and prepare an evaluation so as to present me with options which would assist in its privatization. That work is ongoing. In public statements, including one made in Vancouver in mid-November, I have advised the private sector that the Government of Canada is interested in disposing of Eldorado either by the sale of shares or, alternatively, in the form of some assets pooling. Any such transaction is to be made on commercial terms. With the evaluation work nearly completed, I hope to move soon to a stage where discussions with private Canadian interests are feasible for the privatization, in one form or another, of Eldorado. I do not see any reason why the Government of Canada in the 1980s needs to maintain an investment in the uranium industry. Two or three companies in the private sector are very active in that field, and the strategic role that uranium played at an earlier time in Canadian energy and military history is no longer extant. I think that the Canadian government's public policy purposes for Eldorado have been achieved and the Government of Canada should now find a home for Eldorado's activities within the private investment sector.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am intrigued by the change in attitude of the honourable minister. I can recall that, not too many years ago, the minister did not think very much of privatization of crown corporations.

I am rather interested in the difference between privatizing Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. and privatizing Petro-Canada. Can he explain to us the fine distinction that exists there?

Senator Austin: I would be glad to help the honourable senator. I do not think he can pinpoint any statement made by me at any time in my public or private career that suggests that I do not believe the Government of Canada should put assets back into the private sector when they have fulfilled their public policy requirement.

I believe I have been totally consistent in my position that, when the Government of Canada enters into the acquisition of some interest that is normally a private sector interest, it should do so for reasons of public policy. These public policy reasons can be structural, that is, long-term, or they can be cyclical, that is, short-term. In the case of a cyclical acquisition, of course, the premise is that it will be returned to the private sector when the public policy concern has been discharged. That has always been my position, and it remains my position.

This is expressed through the Government of Canada's establishment of the CDIC, which I have described here at length in answer to questions by Senators Phillips, Roblin and others. Honourable senators will recall that CDIC was initially formed for the holding and disposition of the government's portfolio of investment in the Canada Development Corporation, a policy matter which, from the moment I had ministerial responsibility, I supported and sought to implement.

With respect to the honourable senator's specific question relating to Petro-Canada, I believe Petro-Canada was an investment entered into for public policy reasons of a structural kind. When the Government of Canada sought and received parliamentary approval for the establishment of Petro-Canada, less than 10 per cent of our oil and gas industry was Canadian-controlled—indeed, much less—and barely 10 per cent of that industry was Canadian-owned. Partly as a result of Petro-Canada, the balance is now more like 33 per cent Canadian-controlled and 66 per cent foreign-controlled.

Somewhat more than half of the change was wrought upon the Canadian economy as a result of the federal government's tax policy of encouraging Canadian investment—through drilling funds and other measures—in Canadian private sector activity, but Petro-Canada has played an important role.

Petro-Canada remains, for the Government of Canada, a public policy issue of high priority. It provides the Government of Canada with an important window on a significant industry in Canada's economic and social life. It has also provided the Government of Canada with an instrument to encourage rapid incentive and activity in the development of oil and gas exploration in the Arctic region, such as the high Arctic Islands and the Beaufort Sea. In particular, it has encouraged enhanced activity off Newfoundland in the Hibernia and off Nova Scotia in the Scotian Shelf. Indeed, in both those cases, Petro-Canada's presence has made a substantial difference to the rate of discovery and has changed our appreciation of the quality and quantity of the oil and gas resources that may be deposited there.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the rather verbose reply of the minister indicates that he is as confused on the national energy policy as is the minister responsible.

• (1430)

Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Aside from this prospective privatization—if I may use the word that was so abhorrent to the Liberals—of Eldorado, is it the policy of the government to seek to privatize any of the other crown corporations for which the CDIC is responsible?

Senator Austin: If Senator Phillips found the previous answer to be verbose, then I would take it that his capacity to listen to a substantive answer is somewhat limited. Therefore, I will give him a short answer to this question.

It is the policy of the Government of Canada that any asset under the administration of the Canada Development Investment Corporation is for privatization. The decision, however, will depend upon commercial circumstances.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a further supplementary to the minister. He has been talking about the development of Petro-Canada. As he was speaking, it occurred to me that the people of Canada have paid for Petro-Canada through the medium of a tax on gasoline that was imposed at the pumps. I recently read in the newspapers that the purpose for that tax had been fulfilled. Enough money has been collected from the people of Canada to pay in full for Petro-Canada. As a purchaser of gasoline, however, I can confirm that one is still required to pay the tax at the pump.

The article to which I referred went on to say that it is the intention of the government to continue to impose this tax, notwithstanding that the purpose for which the tax was imposed has been met. The government intends to use this opportunity to add to the taxation of the people of Canada. Apparently the money will be used for additional purposes, which were unspecified. I understand that they will be purposes chosen by the government.

My question is simply this: Is it correct to say that the government intends to continue that tax? If so, can the minister inform us as to the purposes for which the money is to be used?

Senator Austin: I wonder whether Senator Donahoe noticed that legislation was passed by the other place and by the Senate in the form of amendments to the act in question authorizing a wider use of those funds for energy purposes. If Senator Donahoe needs the exact details, I will be pleased to obtain for him a copy of the amendments to that legislation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps that would be a good idea, honourable senators, because I recall this matter. I can tell my honourable friend that, at the committee stage of that bill, I inquired as to the authority by which this tax was still to be levied and the purpose for which it was to be used. I was not provided with an answer. I am still waiting for the answer. I would therefore be pleased if my honourable friend would provide it.

Honourable senators, I will resist the temptation to embark upon a debate on the National Energy Program, because whatever it may have done for the government it certainly ruined the industry. The NEP, combined with the price of oil, did a pretty good job.

ENERGY

PETROLEUM INCENTIVE PROGRAM—STATUS OF GRANTS FOR CANADA LANDS EXPLORATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to restrict myself to a question, which I asked in this chamber some time ago, to which I have not yet received an answer. It has to do with PIP grants. I asked for the total that has been committed in PIP grants over the life of the PIP program. I understand that the amount is in the neighbourhood of $5 billion to $7 billion. I also inquired whether any of the contracts between the government and the industry under which PIP money was dispensed had actually been completed. If so, which were they? If not, which were they and what sort of money was involved?

I would really like the minister to provide an update on what is happening to PIP grants, how much money has been paid out, how much money has been committed for the future and the status of these contracts between the government and private industry under which PIP grants are authorized.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I should first like to repudiate the rhetoric of Senator Roblin with respect to the National Energy Program. There is no doubt that he and I have different points of view. Like Senator Roblin, I will not enter into a debate on the matter now, particularly since this is Question Period. However, because he took an editorial view, I do want to say that the industry in Canada has benefited substantially from the infusion of funds under the National Energy Program. The honourable senator should carefully consider what took place when, first, the present Leader of the Opposition and then the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources went to Calgary and spoke on the issue.

With respect to the question concerning PIP grants, which I well recall being asked by the honourable senator, I had stated that I had no ministerial responsibility to deal with the question and I therefore referred it to Senator Olson as Leader of the Government. Perhaps the answer is even now being prepared for the honourable senator.

Senator Roblin: I do not object to one minister bouncing the question around to another. What I really want is an answer. However, it seems to me that if there is any doubt as to whom the question should be directed, then it should be made clear so that we know to whom we should look for an answer. My understanding of responsibility for dealing with questions asked by the opposition is that they should be answered. Who does the job is the government's affair and none of mine; but I would like to know when the answer may be available.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as the minister knows, although I sit on this side of the house I have been opposed to the National Energy Program from its inception. Perhaps our newer senators should be made aware that, as regional representatives, I consider it our duty to speak out and let it be known how such programs affect our particular area. Therefore, I would ask the minister to indicate how this program has benefited either Alberta or Saskatchewan or, indeed, all of western Canada, and whether the price paid as a result of dislocation of the industry, plus the continuing taxation imposed on the Canadian public, has warranted the expenditure of billions of dollars.

I remain interested in knowing details of any discovery by Petro-Canada of any great new sources of energy, as the minister has indicated in earlier statements. I have not heard any public announcements, but perhaps we are getting some inside information from him. People in the industry tell me that the exploration in the Arctic represents perhaps the greatest waste of public funds ever perpetrated on the Canadian public. My question to the minister is: In assessing the program, does he really believe that the benefits are worth the cost?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the short answer is yes, they are. They far exceed the cost. Canadians have indicated their strongest possible approval for a drive by government to ensure energy security in Canada, and these programs have been designed to ensure, to the extent that the resource base makes it possible, that Canadians have secure sources of hydrocarbon energy located within Canada and accessible to Canadians. It is not a perfect program, senator, but I believe it has brought about substantial benefits, and continues to do so.

I am sorry that the honourable senator has not followed the success achieved by the joint ventures in which Petro-Canada has participated, particularly on the east coast, in Hibernia and the Scotian Shelf. I believe it is clear, particularly to those honourable senators who represent the Atlantic provinces, that without Petro-Canada such programs would have been delayed for many years. It was the presence of Petro-Canada, willing to advance higher risk funds, that brought companies such as Mobil and Shell back into the exploration field—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin:—and much of the exploration funding was provided by Petro-Canada on deals negotiated on a commercial basis—deals, I might add, which I thought were not altogether favourable to Petro-Canada.

Honourable senators have asked a number of other questions and opined considerably about the National Energy Program. I will be pleased, if a sufficient number of honourable senators are interested, to have a motion placed on the order paper to debate the matter or, alternatively, to send the matter to the standing Senate committee that deals with energy matters, when I will be pleased to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to speak to those issues that concern honourable senators.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, that is a very good idea. I think the time has come for the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to review the National Energy Program not just with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who, I am sure, will be glad to present his point of view, but with other ministers and prominent and responsible people in and outside the industry who are affected by the program. I do not know whether this is the appropriate time to move such a motion, but, if it is not made by someone else in due course, I will be pleased to move that the topic of the National Energy Program be referred to the committee. I am sure the Canadian public would be interested in such a study.

My good friend and colleague, Senator Austin, knows my opinion, which comes from living in a different area of the country than he and that I would be very interested in finding out what actually happened. I take issue with one point the honourable senator has raised, namely, that, if it had not been for Petro-Canada—an organization, by the way, which I personally support in principle, finds such as Hibernia would not have been made. The honourable senator also mentioned that only Petro-Canada was willing to enlist additional public money to support some of these projects. These are the kinds of things the committee can investigate. I appreciate the minister's suggestion that this very important subject be open to public scrutiny.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I, too, live in Western Canada. My province has an important natural gas industry. Senator Buckwold and I have always differed on some of these subjects in a friendly but passionate way. I think such an inquiry would be of some advantage. It would give Senator Roblin and others of his persuasion the opportunity to test their theses and, most importantly, as Senator Buckwold said, it would give the industry, both Canadian owned and foreign owned, an opportunity to come forward to express their experiences and views on the National Energy Program and the effect it has had.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has met once; we gave consideration to our future work. At that meeting our view was that the time may be opportune for a review of the National Energy Program with respect to Canadianization and security of supply. We did not make a final decision, but I shall be happy to refer the discussion that has just taken place to the steering committee with a view to instigating such an inquiry into the National Energy Program or some sector of it.

MANITOBA—POSSIBILITY OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING BILINGUALISM

Hon. Philip Deane Gigantes: I would like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government if he would consider proposing that this chamber express its indignation about what is happening now in Manitoba. If the Acting Leader of the Government is agreeable, perhaps he could try to associate the Acting Leader of the Opposition in an initiative of this kind. The Acting Leader of the Opposition has enormous authority in Manitoba, but unfortunately, his party has gone completely off the tracks, and especially its politicians.

All politicians have a duty to tell the truth, to avoid aggravating tensions, to refrain from putting false ideas into people's minds, to refrain from going around saying that what the Government of Manitoba is proposing will affect the chances of anglophones finding jobs in that province, which is not true. There is a whole series of lies that are aggravating tensions between Canada's two founding language communities. I would like to see the Acting Leader of the Government, in conjunction with the Acting Leader of the Opposition, attempt to express our indignation about what is happening now in Manitoba, where the unity of our country is at stake, because we are playing right into the hands of the Quebec separatists.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Personally, I support wholeheartedly the comments and views of Senator Gigantes. I have practically nothing to add to what he said. I share his concern about the situation in Manitoba. Relations between the federal government and a provincial government are always a rather delicate subject, but in this particular case, the situation existing in Manitoba today is certainly in danger of becoming a threat to Canadian unity. I hope the other senators share this view, and I am fairly certain I have expressed the opinion of the Government in this respect.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to add a word to what has been said on this issue. I freely accord to any member of this house the right to bring in a resolution dealing with the subject. If the honourable senator wishes to do so, that is obviously his right as a senator and no one would complain about that. If members of the House of Commons wish to debate the subject, they will also find the opportunity open to them.

However, I wonder whether the question should be asked, "What good will we do by such a move?" The situation in the province of Manitoba is a very delicate one. Senator Guay understands it as well as, if not better than, I do. I think he would say that it is a delicate matter and one which, at the present time, is clearly and unmistakably within the provincial sphere of the Constitution. It raises the question of whether such a debate in this chamber would do any good for that issue or for any of the people involved. I must say that I have some reservations on that score. It seems to me that it might be considered an undue interference in the activities of that province under the Constitution, as it would be, say, if we were to interfere with the province of Quebec by debating here the status of English in that province—which some here, perhaps, were tempted to do in days gone by.

I urge caution before such a motion is introduced in this chamber. In a sense we have made a determination on the subject because shortly before Christmas, I believe, we debated a resolution on the question. That debate provided an opportunity to encourage the people of Manitoba to decide on this matter and to indicate the willingness of Parliament to consider the matter when it reached the stage where our consideration was constitutionally required. I believe that no one in this chamber dissented from that resolution, nor was there any dissent in the other chamber. So the general position of Parliament is clear.

I am left with the question of what good we will do now, if we attempt to re-examine this issue at this particular stage in the negotiations in the province of Manitoba. I understand the senator's motive and I do not impugn it in any way, because it is a matter of great concern. The issue has reached a very unhappy stage in Manitoba. I, personally, and I am sure many others, have considered what contribution to make to the solution of that problem. My own conclusion is that at this stage it is inadvisable for a senator to undertake to intervene in the issue with which the legislature of the Province of Manitoba is seized. We may not like the way the matter is going and we may not like the way the legislature is handling it but, nevertheless, that is the fact. Considering the federal nature of this country and the nature of this particular issue, it seems to me that we might be well advised to ask ourselves whether we will add anything of a constructive nature to the solution of the problem by debating it here at the present time.

Having said that, I simply repeat that it is the right of every senator to bring in a resolution and to speak to this subject. In no way would I inhibit that right. If my honourable friend wishes to do so, he has that liberty. But I say to him that he ought to consider carefully whether such a move would truly be constructive and in the interest of not only my province but the nation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to add a comment with respect to one aspect of what Senator Roblin has said. I agree it is worthwhile for the Senate, and for senators, to reflect on whether anything useful can be done and whether it is appropriate for the Senate to deal with this question.

In reflecting on that issue, I advance the suggestion that in any federal country certain activities taken by the national government have an effect, politically, on the provincial governments. I have never known the provincial legislatures to be diffident about discussing such implications. There are times when a dimension of provincial political activity has a national effect. If I understand the issue correctly, that is the burden of Senator Gigantes' question. I support the idea of our giving consideration to whether it would be appropriate for us to discuss the events from a political point of view. I use the term in the small "p" political sense as opposed to the capital "P" sense.

Although the legislature of Manitoba is properly seized of the question constitutionally, I think that a case can be made for saying that there may be a dimension to this question that is national and that therefore would properly be a subject for our consideration from a regional-national point of view.

Senator Roblin: That may be true, but it brings us back to the fundamental question: Do you think some good can be done by this motion? I have to say that I think not; however, that is a subject about which every member of this house will have to make up his own mind.

Senator Gigantes: We are facing a situation in which politicians in the province of Manitoba are deliberately distorting the facts in order to inflame passions. The people of Manitoba are good people but the leadership in that province is misleading them. That is why I liked so much the comments of the Acting Leader of the Government, when he said that we do have a role to play and that we must speak out for the truth, because that is what is at stake. Lies are being used to divide the country and they are of the order of, "French on a cereal box will harm you"—well, let them eat the cardboard with the English on it.

OFFICE ACCOMMODATION IN CALGARY

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers. I will start off with an answer to one of Senator Balfour's questions, which seems like a good opening since I told him I would try to obtain an answer for him. The reason I did not furnish this answer earlier is that technically, the question disappeared from the order paper when we closed the last session of Parliament. I say this not as an excuse but as a reason. However, Senator Balfour has raised the question again and it is one which deals with Petro-Canada. I do not have an answer for his other question, but I will try to obtain that also.

Some of the buildings Petro-Canada is vacating, as it moves into its new building will be left unoccupied and the company will have to continue to pay rentals until new tenants are found. That is not an unusual situation for any company, as I am sure Senator Balfour understands. There is considerable vacant space in Calgary and most companies are faced with this problem. However, Petro-Canada has found tenants for some of the space it is vacating.

Petro-Canada has a 70 per cent space allocation in its new building, which it has financed jointly with Belgian interests. It has a provision over the long term for obtaining this space at less than the commercial rate. In other words, it will save on its office requirements in relation to the going rate. Furthermore, 50 per cent of Petro-Canada's rent will be paid to itself because it is a 50 per cent owner.

Estimates of amounts paid by Petro-Canada in rentals—past and future—on empty building space cannot be made available because the company is endeavouring to find occupants for this space. Consequently, in the marketing process information concerning rental rates is considered to be of a proprietary nature.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I thought you said you had an answer.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Is that an answer?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I clarify again that we try to obtain information that we always hope will be satisfactory. We endeavour to succeed as much as possible on the first part, that is, obtaining the information. We know that our success rate with regard to the second part is not always equal to that of the first part.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Do you make those words your own?

SUBSIDIES TO FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin concerning subsidies that the post office provides for foreign publications. This is a two-page long answer with some excerpts from the Canada Gazette.

Canada Post Corporation is responding to a government policy decision to cease subsidizing postage for foreign publications. This regulation change will mean that no new foreign publications will qualify for preferential rates while the corporation is reviewing its publication mail product lines and rate structures in anticipation of moving to more commercial rates for foreign publications. It is too early to speculate on what decisions the corporation and affected customers will make on future rate levels and product lines.

There is some background information which I suggest be made part of the answer. We can deal with it further on Thursday if that is satisfactory to honourable senators.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Does the background information include the subsidies that are provided for foreign publications in Canada now? I think that was part of my question.

Senator Frith: I believe it does; however, I will have to check that. I suggest we make it part of the answer.

Senator Roblin: I will take a look at it, then.

(The background information follows):

BACKGROUND

The federal government has for many years subsidized the second-class mailing costs of both domestic and selected foreign publications.

Since 1979-80, Canada Post has been compensated by the federal government through the Department of Communications (DOC) for its losses on publisher's rate categories.

In December, 1982, cabinet decided to "split" these funds into two parts.

Approximately $53 million will be used to buy postal rate reductions by DOC, in the interests of furthering specific government policy objectives. The reductions will be subject to negotiations. Approximately $170 million is also paid by the government to defray those (historical infrastructure) costs associated with preferential rates (beginning in the fiscal year 1983-84). In time, it is anticipated these infrastructure costs will be reduced and absorbed into the overall operating costs of the corporation.

While eligible foreign publications now enjoy this subsidy as well, DOC announced July 14, 1983, that it intended to end this practice following the end of the "6 & 5" restraint program in 1984.

A freeze will be placed on further applications for registration for both the code 5 and 6 categories ("foreign publications mailed in Canada" and foreign publications "printed in Canada").

Canadian publications will not be directly affected by the July decision.

Foreign publications which presently benefit the most from foreign subsidies include Time and Newsweek magazine and a group of six magazines published by the Jehovah's Witnesses.

The amendments were printed in the Canada Gazette Part I on January 7, 1984.

It is recommended that anyone wishing to make representations do so before February 21, 1984, although they have until March 7, 1984. This is in line with section 17 of the Canada Post Corporation Act under which the corporation is required to give interested persons an opportunity to make representations.

A news release announcing the gazetting was to be issued January 6, 1984.

Newsweek remains the only major publication to have applied for the privileges in the past year.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senators Roblin and Guay on February 2, 1984, concerning what form of public exposure will be given to the conclusions of the Joint Technical Committee on the Garrison Diversion project.

The Joint Technical Committee reports to the co-chairmen of the consultative group on the Garrison project and must submit a joint report on each of its meetings to the consultative group.

I think that most senators interested in this subject understand that the consultative group is the group that deals with the project and, particularly, deals with the implementation of Phase I and any effect on Canadian waters.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Who is on the committee?

Senator Frith: The Joint Technical Committee, which is the subject matter of the question, monitors the implementation from a technical point of view, as I think Senator Roblin mentioned in his question.

The Joint Technical Committee, however, made a specific decision to prepare a press line at the end of each meeting, although it is an advisory body that is not particularly seeking publicity.

The consultative group, itself, will be meeting in Washington in April and will also prepare a press line.

Senator Roblin: Before my honourable friend goes on to the next delayed answer, I must confess that I am unaware of who make up the consultative group, which is apparently the decision-making body, is that correct?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is correct.

Senator Roblin: I would trespass on my honourable friend's good nature to ask him if he would tell me in due course who they are.

Senator Frith: I will try to find that out. I will also endeavour to verify whether the decisions made by the consultative group are what can be called policy decisions and whether it is up to the technical committee to advise the consultative group of technical questions that require its policy decision, which is my understanding. I will try to find out not only the names of those who sit on the consultative group but also whether I am right with respect to its mandate.

Senator Roblin: Is the point that the consultative group decides what will be done?

Senator Frith: That is precisely my understanding and that is what I wish to be sure about.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have some supplementary remarks to make with respect to this issue. It seems to me that it will be too late by the time this meeting is held in Washington in the month of April. I do not see any particular reason why this letter is being delayed. Can the acting leader tell me why they will wait until April 1, which is more than a month and a half from now, before holding a meeting or making representations to Washington? The provincial government in Manitoba is, in fact, putting pressure on the federal government right now to hold a meeting as soon as possible.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have almost despaired of reaching any sort of meeting of minds with Senator Guay on this process, but, for the record, I would like to get it straight as I understand it.

The Consultative Committee is not there to apply pressure; the Consultative Committee is there to be sure that any implementation of Phase I, represented by the $53 million that is in the budget, does not affect Canadian waters, because that is the undertaking which has been given. The problem for the Consultative Committee is exactly the problem Senator Guay is concerned about, and that is to assure themselves that implementing Phase I does not affect Canada or Canadian waters.

On the other hand, the technical committee is there to examine the technical implementation of the program and to advise the Consultative Committee, if they are of the opinion that the technical aspect of the implementation in any way goes against the undertaking that Phase I will not affect Canada.

That is my understanding. I know that Senator Guay knows that that is my understanding. However, he seems to feel that the Consultative group is there to apply pressure to change the policy. As I understand it, the Consultative Group is there simply to say to the United States: "You have given an undertaking that the implementation of Phase I, for which the $53 million is allocated, will not affect Canadian waters. We are here to keep an eye on you to make sure that that is true." The technical committee is there to make sure that it is true, technically.

Senator Guay: I have a supplementary. You may call it Phase I or whatever you like, but every time the Americans spend a dollar on this project they are coming closer and closer to the Canadian boundary.

I shall give you one example of what is in my mind and the reason I am concerned. If you are building a house and you call the basement Phase I, the fact is that the basement for that house is being built and someday there will be a roof on it—

Senator Roblin: And that will be Phase II.

Senator Guay: That will be Phase II. I am concerned by the fact that they are building Phase I because when Phase II eventually comes about, then we will be affected in Manitoba. That is my concern.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, for the reasons I mentioned in my earlier answers, I do not think that the analogy is apt.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX-EVASION—PUBLICATION OF LIST—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on February 2, 1984. Perhaps in the future I shall not use the word "answer", since it is obvious that the opposition often does not treat the matter as an answer. In any event, if I understand the rules correctly, what the government is bound to provide is information.

With that in mind, I have information in response to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on February 2, 1984 concerning the publication of a list by Revenue Canada of persons or firms convicted of tax evasions between March and September of 1983 which also contained a list of those acquitted of charges.

The Minister of National Revenue informs me that the publication of such lists has been common practice in the department for a long time. Honourable senators will remember that I shared the hope expressed by Senator Nurgitz that it was not a matter of policy to do so. However the justification is the one that we anticipated.

Senator Nurgitz asked why the names of those persons or firms who have been acquitted are published along with the names of those who have been convicted. The reason is that, if the individual in question has suffered from the publicity around the fact that a charge was laid, it should also be publicized that his innocence was recognized through an acquittal by the court.

I agree with that reason in part. Certainly, if someone has been charged and there has been publicity and then that person or corporation is subsequently acquitted and wishes that information to be publicized, I think it should be publicized. Therefore, I am heartened to find out that there is a special task force within the department's information division, part of whose mandate it will be to review information practices; the practice of publicizing convictions and acquittals by the courts will also be examined. I mean to convey to the minister the concern I share with Senator Nurgitz that this refinement to the question of publicizing acquittals be given consideration, in addition to considering the whole question.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary, if I may. Surely, the Acting Leader of the Government understands that one does not need a task force to take the innocent and throw them in with the guilty. This is a government, I might add, that is committed to such things as the Charter of Rights and the rights of individuals. When we on this side of the house indicated that we did not wish those rights enshrined in the Constitution, we were told that we were against those rights.

I would also point out that there have already been newspaper articles referring to taxpayers who have been angered. The Toronto Globe and Mail features a story that says, "Release of Name After Tax Acquittal Leaves Man Angry". Naturally he was angry, since, if people were not previously aware that he had been charged, they were certainly aware once they read the list that had been published.

I would like to quote from a release of Revenue Canada:

According to a summary of prosecutions released today for the six-month period, Revenue Canada Taxation prosecuted 107 taxpayers for evading taxes of nearly $2 million.

Included in that figure of 107 are twelve taxpayers who were found not guilty; included in the $2 million are monies that were found not to be owing to the government, not having been evaded.

This is my question to the Acting Leader of the Government: Will he agree to add the innocent to his figures of those prosecuted; to add to the amounts that the department claimed were evaded the amounts found not evaded, and will he agree with me that this is a despicable practice and that all we need is common sense and the ordinary laws that we adhere to on a day-to-day basis and not, in fact, a task force to tell us that?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I cannot associate myself with the adjective "despicable," but I can associate myself with the idea and the principle that, within the context of the need for publicity, there may, indeed, be a case made for the need for some publicity with regard to prosecutions.

If I could digress a little here, as honourable senators well know, for example, with reference to restrictive trade practices, for many years it was felt as a matter of policy that part of the enforcement and sanction technique was to ensure that there was plenty of publicity about these sorts of prosecutions.

It seems to me, however, that Senator Nurgitz and I clearly agree that there is a question about the need for publicity. The second question is: Is there any advantage in publishing a list of those convicted? That is something that this task force should look at.

The next question is: Should there be publicity with regard to those who have been acquitted? It seems to me quite clear that, very frequently, the charge is laid and it is many years later that the charge is disposed of. In such cases, the matter is often totally forgotten, and then, when someone is acquitted, the whole matter is raised again. It seems to me that, if the department is going to proceed with that system, acquitted persons should be able to say whether or not they wish to be involved in any publicity.

On the last point raised by Senator Nurgitz, which is that even if they do proceed with that system, they should be careful exactly how they word the charge, that, too, should be the subject of agreement by the accused. I hope the task force will also look at this area.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Senator Nurgitz: I am sure other honourable senators will agree with me, when I say that I do not care what a task force might or might not agree to or recommend.

• (1510)

I put it to the acting leader that to publish a person's name, home town, occupation or business, the description of the offence, the years in which it took place and the tax amount alleged to have been evaded, and then to insert the word "acquitted" does prejudice an innocent man. If that does not, what does?

Surely, we can ask the department to announce a policy today that will avoid that happening again. We ought not to wait for a task force to report, but should ask the department to make a policy announcement on that now. I ask the acting leader whether he agrees with that.

Senator Frith: I agree that we should ask for that now.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MANITOBA—POSSIBILITY OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING BILINGUALISM

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, with your indulgence, I should like to add to the subject raised by the Honourable Senator Gigantes.

I have been feeling somewhat guilty sitting in my seat saying nothing. As the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate considers the proposition put to him, I ask that he consider the opinion of one New Brunswicker. It is too bad Senator Robichaud is not present today because he could contribute a great deal to this subject.

I was somewhat involved in New Brunswick when certain people inflamed the emotions of the residents of that province. That caused a situation to arise in New Brunswick similar to that now prevailing in Manitoba. Let me say that I have tremendous sympathy for all of the people of Manitoba because of the very difficult circumstances in which they are now living. I hope that they find a quick solution to their problem. It is sad when emotions are raised in a country such as this along the line of racial issues or language issues. It is very difficult for any government and any party to regain control once emotions have taken over.

As I have said, I lived in New Brunswick when the residents of that province were involved in a similar situation. I suggest to the leader and to all honourable senators that the best service the Senate can give to the people of Manitoba at this point in time is to let them settle the problem in Manitoba.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Hear, hear.

Senator McElman: If the Canadian Parliament had intervened in the affairs of New Brunswick at the time emotions were running high, it would have done no service to the people of that province. People in all political parties would have considered that to be mischief-making, and very dangerous mischief-making.

Finally, honourable senators, legislators in Manitoba must be going through a very serious time at the moment, because surely they know, and surely we must understand, that one cannot legislate people to do anything they will not accept.

New Brunswick became the only legally official bilingual province in Canada, not by continuing to stir emotions, not by heeding interventions from outside the province, but by reaching a point in time where it was felt the majority of the people in New Brunswick were prepared to do the right thing; then the right thing was done.

Although it was the Honourable Louis Robichaud's administration that brought in that initial legislation, I am delighted to say that Premier Hatfield, the leader of the Conservative government of the day, has matured that legislation and has helped to solve the problems that have arisen.

So, too, as in New Brunswick, the people of Manitoba can be legislated to do only what they are prepared to accept, and nothing this body can contribute at this point in time would do anything but make mischief.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—
(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Donahoe.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, it is with a certain amount of trepidation that I rise to discuss this report. It is a matter of speculation at this time as to what action, if any, will be taken as a result of this report. It is conceivable that the recommendations in the report may be adopted; it is equally conceivable that they may be rejected. If they are rejected, then one could say it is as a result of the deliberations of this body that we ceased to make any progress in the direction of reform of the Senate.

This afternoon I am going to speak in essence to express the ideas which I expressed in Halifax at the time I appeared before the joint committee. I hasten to say that the ideas I expressed at that time were warmly greeted. I was applauded for having expressed them, I presume both for the ideas and for the manner in which they were expressed, but I can assure you that little or no attention was paid to them when the report was prepared, because my views are not at all consistent with the views of those who wrote this report.

I said I was a little fearful about this occasion this afternoon, and I am, because I do not wish to have it said that anything I say in any way stood in the way of reform of the Senate.

We on this side, and myself in particular, are just as ready to see the Senate made more effective and more useful as is anybody who sits on the other side of this chamber, but where we part ways very often is on the question as to how that can be accomplished.

I admit quite freely, as I admitted before the committee, that I am not an innovative person. I am not a person who can express great ideas as to how one should solve one's problem, but I am a pretty good fellow—and I said this before the committee—to point out the mistakes you will make if you do what you are proposing. In other words, I can see what is wrong with a proposition a lot more easily than I can construct a successful proposition of my own. This report we are discussing deals with an issue that has been debated for many, many years.

I think it is fair to say that the question of whether we had a valid and valuable Senate arose almost as soon as Confederation itself. There have been many arguments about it. It has been like the sea; the tide comes in and the tide goes out. There have been times when the surge of opinion about the necessity of reform has been very great. There have been other times when it attracted little or no attention. As I said, it is like high tide and low tide. The curious thing about a tide is that when it has ebbed the land remains pretty much untouched. The surge of opinion back and forth about the Senate brought about very little change. There have been some changes but they were of little significance.

I read an article in the newspaper the other day about Senate reform and I now want to discuss it because I think it requires discussion. The headline read "Trudeau Blames the PCs for Delaying Senate Reform." I thought that that was an awful thing to say because as a Progressive Conservative I had expressed the view that I supported sound propositions which have been put forward for Senate reform. I am not against reform but I am against change unless it is going to serve a useful purpose. Having read that headline, I was curious enough to read the rest of the article. I do not know how many of you read it, but I invite you to read it. My interpretation of what Prime Minister Trudeau said in that article was that he had tried to reform the Senate. He introduced a bill in the House of Commons, sent it to the Senate and got all kinds of objections to it. He said that the bill did not pass because the PCs stopped its passage. That may be his understanding of what transpired, but what the PCs said was that this proposition which Prime Minister Trudeau was putting forward was one which is beyond his legislative power. He does not have the right under Canada's Constitution to put this legislation forward. The PCs said not only that but they also said that he should not take our word for it but put the matter before the highest court in the land, the Supreme Court of Canada. They suggested that that body should decide whether Mr. Trudeau has the right to pass this type of legislation. That legislation was withdrawn. Do you know why it was withdrawn? It was because the Supreme Court of Canada decided that this legislation was beyond the jurisdictional capacity of Mr. Trudeau. Despite such merits they might have felt it had, they decided it was unconstitutional. That decision was made by the same body that honourable senators opposite me, and even some of them around me, thought should be made the major decision-making body as to whether a person's human rights were being attacked. The Supreme Court of Canada has the power to decide on legal questions concerning what takes place in this country.

You have all heard, and you will hear again, that the Senate is an ineffectual and useless body. Even two members of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate said that the Senate should be abolished. There are many outside the Senate who do not hesitate to say the same thing.

You must bear in mind that the body that made these recommendations to us largely represents the same group of people who brought forward the proposition that was defeated in the Supreme Court of Canada. As I said, the Supreme Court of Canada is an appointed body, as we are. On what grounds is our power and our ability questioned? Is it on the ground that we are not wise, is it on the ground that we are stupid and on the ground that people get into the Senate who never should be here? It is not on any of those grounds but on the ground that we are an appointed body.

Do not misunderstand me. I am a lawyer and I am not criticizing the Supreme Court of Canada, but if you read the Constitution of Canada it says that the Supreme Court of Canada is an appointed body to which vast power has been given. Its judges did not have to get elected to gain that power; they only had to meet the approval of the person who appointed them. The person responsible for the appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada is the identical person responsible for the appointment of senators. He appoints us to the Senate and he appoints the judges to sit in the Supreme Court of Canada. Judges are worthy of being extolled and placed on the highest pinnacle and given all that power. At the same time, because we are an appointed body we should not be listened to.

I speak with some trepidation about this report. It is my hope that this report will be rejected. I do not wish to be put in the position that somebody like Mr. Trudeau can say of me that "that senator from Nova Scotia contributed to standing in my way by preventing reform of the Senate." Regardless of what I may think of this report and regardless of any remarks that I may make about it, I sincerely believe that much can be done to improve the Senate and make it a more effective body. I do not think that electing its members can accomplish that.

I have in my hand a copy of Issue 13 of the transcript of the evidence given to the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate. That issue includes a report of the speech that I made to the committee in Halifax. I do not intend to bore you by repeating my entire speech. I believe that some of you will never take the trouble to read it and, of course, all of you were not present when I gave that speech and you deserve to be regaled by it, but I will leave that regaling to you. I recommend the speech to you as a good one, a sound one and it has some excellent ideas in it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): You are going to have to work on that humility problem.

Senator Donahoe: Ideas speak for themselves. They do not necessarily rely on what I say about them. It is not that I have put forward these ideas but it is merely that of themselves they carry weight and importance.

There are a couple of paragraphs of this speech that I think are worthy of being repeated this afternoon. The first paragraph, which is on page 13:43, reads as follows:

Well, I want to tell the committee this morning that my reason for being here is that I do not believe in an elected Senate. I do not believe that an elected Senate would solve any of the problems or give any more or greater credibility to the Senate than it enjoys at the present time.

I do not want to belabour the subject or try to convince you that that is true. I want you to understand that when I discussed this report I started from the premise that I do not believe in an elected Senate.

There are several other paragraphs that might be of interest to honourable senators.

At page 13:45 it states:

We,—

By "we" I am referring to honourable senators—

—of course, feel that we are equal to the House of Commons right now.

Does anyone want to argue that point? I am ready to debate the subject. It goes on to state:

It is true that constitutional amendments are not available to us—

I am sure I will not get any argument about that. The power of negating any proposition relating to the Constitution was taken away from us by the Constitution Act, 1982.

• (1530)

Senator Frith: Only the absolute veto.

Senator Donahoe: I beg your pardon, the power of negating any constitutional amendment was taken away from us by the statute. I do not care what the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate says; that is a legal fact.

Senator Frith: Only the absolute veto was taken away, not the power to negate.

Senator Donahoe: If the power of negation is to be interpreted as not meaning the power of veto, then I do not understand the English language.

Senator Frith: The absolute veto.

Senator Donahoe: I think that "the power of negation," as I used it, means that we have given up our right of veto to a proposition relating to the Constitution and that, therefore, we cannot negate. We cannot deny the House of Commons what it wishes to say about the Constitution. If it says it, we can make the members think about it, we can delay it, and we can hold it in abeyance for a certain length of time, but we cannot prevent it from passing; that is all I said. We cannot negate it.

I do not care what the Acting Leader of the Government thinks the word "negate" means. "Negate" to me means that you cannot do it.

Senator Frith: The feeling is mutual.

Senator Donahoe: We will not carry on a personal argument about the meaning of the English language because I am sure all honourable senators have dictionaries and can look it up for themselves. If "negation" does not mean that you can stop something from happening or you can deny someone the right to do something, then, in my view, it does not mean anything.

Just so there can be no mistake and just in case I am wrong in my interpretation of the word "negation," then I say we have lost our power of veto over a constitutional amendment. I do not hear anyone take issue with that statement.

Senator Frith: Absolute veto.

Senator Donahoe: I think the two statements are the same, but I will phrase it in this way so there can be no misunderstanding.

—we have only a suspensive veto with respect to constitutional amendments.

I do understand what goes on.

But it is equally true that we have wide powers of authority with respect to most things, except the money bills. I am not going to make any reference to the money bills, but our general scope of authority is a wide one. It is said: Oh yes, but the Senate never exercises it. I say: Look, if I carry a club in my hand, I do not have to hit you over the head for you to know that I have the club. The club is there, and you know that you can take me so far. You can take me a long, long distance, and I am not going to use the club. But you also know that if you go too far you will get whacked over the head with the club. That is exactly the position the Senate is in.

As a result of the Constitution, we are no longer in that position.

If we follow the recommendations of the report, we will destroy our last remaining power; our last remaining rights of veto will be taken away from us, and we will be reduced to merely a debating society with a suspensive veto. No one pays a damn bit of attention to us now, and I guarantee that they will pay a hell of a lot less attention to us then. They would not ask whether we were elected or appointed. They would simply say, "We don't give a damn; we will do what we want." In other words, we will have lost our power, and it will not be restored to us merely by the fact that someone has voted to put us in this chamber. They will elect us to this chamber to be nonentities, and nonentities we will remain.

When I talk about the future of the Senate, I want it to be perfectly clear that, when I stand for an appointed Senate, I am not advocating anything in my own interest.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, may I rise on a point of order?

Senator Donahoe: Certainly.

Senator Perrault: I am very pleased to inform honourable senators that Canada has just defeated the United States 4-2 in the first game of the Olympic hockey competition.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the former leader for the interruption because I cannot think of any better news, and I cannot think of it coming more auspiciously since it provides a measure of relief from having to listen to me.

Another paragraph in my speech reads as follows:

We have a veto with respect to legislation produced from the House of Commons. We have no desire to exercise it. We have no need to exercise it in the main because we polish, refine and consider the legislation so when it comes forward it is in the main well-considered legislation. I do not say it is good legislation necessarily, but I believe that under our system we have a government which is going to bring forward what it believes to be good for the people. It is not the function of the Senate to say that it is going to stand against the people and prevent them from getting what the government they elected thinks they should have. Therefore, we do not exercise our veto capriciously or extensively; but it is there and it is always available and it serves as a curb, in my view at least, on the House of Commons as to what they can do.

I am prepared to argue that proposition.

I should also like to read a paragraph which deals with the conference of the provincial premiers. It states:

With respect to the premiers' conference I only want to say this—and this is a purely personal opinion: I think in some ways it is a complete new growth of a non-justified and unwarranted level of government. I do not believe the premiers of the provinces are elected to perform the function that is now being performed in the premiers' conference. If a province is to speak, I see no reason why the province should speak merely from the voice of one man without his being required to consult his own caucus, to consult his own party, still less to consult the elected legislature. In my opinion, it is frequently overlooked that we are listening in this country to a conference of individuals no greater and no better than I am with opinions no better based than mine—different, perhaps, but no better based. They are simply speaking those opinions that come to them by virtue of the exercise of their authority; they are speaking on subjects they were not elected to speak on and on which they have no mandate to speak.

That is what I think. When we considered amending the Constitution of this country, the premiers met with the Prime Minister of the country, but nothing happened. Why? There was no agreement; there was no consensus; there was no authority for the Constitution to be amended, but it was amended. How did it become amended? It was amended because, at a certain point, those men sitting in that room together, Mr. Trudeau and his confrères from the various provinces—most of them belonging to my party—said, “We will accept what you are proposing to be the Constitution of Canada.” I have left out the fact that Mr. Lévesque did not consent. He withdrew, and they chose to ignore Mr. Lévesque. They chose to believe that the consensus of all the other provinces was a true consensus, and they proceeded on that premise.

Honourable senators should understand that no real progress towards amending the Constitution in the way it was done took place until it was decided at the premiers’ conference that it should be so amended.

● (1540)

In my opinion, honourable senators, those men were not elected for that purpose. Those men were not briefed on the matter. While they may have been briefed by their own employees, they were not briefed by the public, nor did they take the public into their confidence as to what they were proposing to do. I am of the opinion that that is not the right way to go about things.

Honourable senators, the Senate has been criticized for not carrying out its function, which is to represent adequately the regions of the country. I told the members of the committee that during the five years I have been in the Senate, nobody—no private citizen, no businessman, no politician, no elected member, no provincial cabinet minister, no premier—has ever said to me, “Look, you are in a valid position to affect what is going to take place in our province. Please use the forum that has been granted to you to make those men and women in the Senate understand that such and such is the view of our province.”

Honourable senators, perhaps the greatest criticism of this body is that the Senate is here at the whim of the Prime Minister in power. Do not misunderstand me. I am not necessarily saying that the same would not apply if a prime minister of my political persuasion were in power. I think that he would do exactly the same thing. Perhaps I should not mention this, but I believe that the leader of my party has even made statements to that effect, namely, that if he were in power he would appoint his party supporters to this body. Therefore, I am not criticizing the appointment of party supporters to the Senate. I simply think that some of the appointments are much better justified than others, but that is a personal opinion. I hesitate to express that opinion because it is not going to change anything. The people who have been chosen by the Prime Minister are here and I hope and pray that they will serve as ornaments to this body. I hope that they will bring contributions of value to this body.

This afternoon I listened with interest to Senator Gigantes. Although I am not in the least ready to agree with him—I join in the opinion of my deputy leader that his is a much mistaken suggestion, and I was interested to hear it criticized from the other side of the chamber as well—nevertheless I think it is good to see new senators come forward with ideas. They may not be ideas that stand, they may not be ideas that are accepted, but it is refreshing to think that there are senators who identify problems and who think that the Senate should have something to do with solving those problems.

Honourable senators need not be alarmed; I have only a few more comments to make. At the committee meeting to which I referred, somebody—it does not state who—listened to me and decided to be a little pejorative. He said, “In other words, you are a Conservative.” I have never denied that I was a Conservative. I have belonged to the Conservative Party all my life. It is true that that party, in true Conservative fashion, has advocated change only when it was felt that proposals were improper; it has gone along with progress. Today, then, we call ourselves Progressive Conservatives.

At any rate, in answer to the criticism that I was a Conservative, I said:

That may be.

I even repeated myself:

That may be. I do not believe in change for the sake of change, I will tell you that. I believe that I want to know that my change is going to be an effective one, and that is what the professor said when she sat here too.

The professor to whom I referred was the witness who appeared immediately before me. While I do not intend to read what she said, I do not mind telling honourable senators that she said many things of great value with which I could agree.

I went on to say:

Do not just elect a Senate because you think it might work, and hope and pray to God that it will work; do not do that. What she is saying is: be pretty well satisfied in your mind before you opt for an elected Senate that it is going to perform better than the present one that we now have.

Honourable senators, I think that she was right. I think that I was right.

Having said that, I now come to the meat of the subject, which is the report. Honourable senators, it is a good report—it is a voluminous and a pretty report. All honourable senators have received a copy of it and it deserves to be read. When it is read, it deserves to be thrown into the waste basket.

Honourable senators, I am not going to deal with the entire report but I have made one or two notes about it. First, the joint committee declared itself in favour of an elected Senate. Having taken that position, it was then faced with the choice between the majority system and proportional representation. My chief objection to an elected Senate is that, in my opinion, such a Senate is contrary to the nature of the federal system under which we live. This system was set up in 1867 and it is still functioning. The effect of it is that the dominant body—the deciding body—is the House of Commons.

The Senate also performs its function. As I have said, we senators carry a big stick which we can use if we have to. We have not often found it necessary to do so, but we have been given the privilege of discussing the legislation in this chamber and in committee, where we hear the opinions, ideas and views of witnesses with respect to legislation. Don't tell me that this is not a useful system. In this session, the Senate will receive from the House of Commons a bill which is, in essence, the same as that which was brought down by the government in the last session. That bill came before a committee of the Senate, where it was considered, discussed and reported. In the committee's view, it was a poor bill and needed to be altered. I will not go into details; I merely want to point out that the bill which is now coming forward has incorporated in it virtually every amendment which was suggested by the Senate of Canada. That is what was done by the Senate; that is what was accepted by the House of Commons; that is the way the system is supposed to work.

As I have said, we on this side are not about to oppose legislation merely for the sake of opposing. We are not even going to oppose merely because a change is suggested. All we ask is to be satisfied that a proposed change is workable and that it will effect an improvement.

When they were faced with the problem of deciding whether they should go with majority or proportional representation, they chose to adopt a system similar to but unlike the system used in the House of Commons. There will not be the same constituencies, and so on. If I represented a region in Nova Scotia larger than the city in which I live and the region included more than one federal constituency, then I would consider myself to be equal to the member for Halifax or the member for Central Nova; indeed, I would be equal to whoever the other member might be. I would be equal to all of those members, because the people in those constituencies would have voted me into the Senate, and therefore I would be three times as good as the fellow who had only one-third of the people to say that he should go to the House of Commons. I therefore warn honourable senators about that.

In the caucus of the party to which I belong a statement was made by an honourable senator to the effect that he would speak in favour of an elected Senate. That statement was well received; he received a good deal of applause. I do not speak often in caucus, and perhaps I should not be mentioning what went on at that meeting. However, I am not disclosing any secrets, because what I said there I will say here. I rose to my feet and said that I was as much opposed to the proposed system as he was in favour of it, and I assured the meeting that if he spoke in favour of it I would speak against it. That is why, honourable senators, you are now being subjected to my comments—because I am not content to sit here and accept these recommendations for Senate reform.

If my present experience is similar to my past experience, then it will not matter one iota what I say here today; it will not matter what arguments I put forward or how cogent they are, because in the past my views have been disregarded and, at times, treated with contempt and pushed to one side. I have seen closed minds decide the issue simply by voting in the way it was suggested they should vote.

A further recommendation is that the constituencies be larger. I have already made the point that we would represent more people, and, therefore, if we were elected and represented more people we would be more important than the person who represented a lesser number.

There is also a section dealing with the senatorial term and the timing of elections. I have one brief comment to make in connection with that. It is suggested that senators would play a different role, that they would have more power, and that greater validity and acceptance would be accorded our deliberations because of the fact that we would be elected. Those things might flow from an elected Senate. We might even become a strong body, equal to the House of Commons. At the moment the strength is concentrated in the House of Commons, and any additional strength that might flow to us is drained off in the other place. If we accepted the recommendations of this report, I would say that not only would senators be elected but they would also be emasculated. The report says that an elected Senate could do nothing but delay and defer, and there would be nothing but a suspensive veto. I do not believe it can be argued that the body we now represent would be strengthened by being granted a suspensive veto, when we would have taken from us what is now a legitimate and real veto.

The report deals with the distribution of seats and recommends that the number of seats be increased to 144. If we are to detract from the authority that 100 members of this Senate now have, and change the real veto we now have to a suspensive veto, then we shall not have done a damned thing by sending 44 more persons to the Senate. We will have merely increased the opportunity for debate and will have given a greater opportunity for more people to receive the accolade and reward of going to the Senate. It will have been made a little more difficult for them to get there and we shall perhaps have altered the character of the type of person who would want to enter the Senate, because I cannot believe that persons of the calibre of those who are presently in the Senate will be satisfied to spend their own money, or their party's money, and their time and effort in order to be elected to this body, when, in the final analysis, they will have little power to make changes, but will merely have the opportunity to speak about them. I could talk about what goes on in the other place even if I never saw the Senate, and I could contribute articles to the press. Also, although God forbid, I could talk on radio and television, but my experience leads me to think that that would be a poor way for me to address issues. Nevertheless, the media exist and exercise tremendous power.

I am not opposed to the principle of provincial equality. When Confederation was first formed, certain provinces were involved and distribution of Senate seats was determined. Later, other provinces joined Confederation and some of them have prospered and their populations have increased. In the scheme of things, some are now of more importance than some of the provinces that originally agreed to Confederation; yet at the time they entered Confederation they did not receive any recognition commensurate with the importance they later achieved. That importance did not exist at the time. Steps were therefore taken to give such provinces further authority to place them on an equal basis with the others. I do not object to that. However, I do not believe that any addition to this house will increase its value or provide any extra power when, at the same time, we emasculate its authority.

Mention has been made of a double majority. Mention was made earlier this afternoon about how careful one must be not to disturb people's sensibilities when speaking, not to interfere in certain matters, and to speak delicately about racial questions and the French question. Such subjects are difficult and delicate, and I do not propose to aggravate the situation in any way. I would merely say that the committee dealt with the question of amendments to the Constitution and said that we should have a double majority. In other words, it expressed lack of confidence in the fairness of one section of the population. It said that many people in this country could not be trusted to be fair to the minority, which perhaps held different views, spoke a different language and followed a different religion. I do not happen to believe that. I believe, with my deputy leader and with Senator McElman, that if the matter is properly presented the time will come when fairness and justice will prevail. I do not believe that there is justice in telling me or anyone else that a French-speaking senator has two votes while an English-speaking senator has only one. I neither approve of nor believe that such a proposal will solve the problem before us.

In dealing with ratification of appointments, they said that we in the Senate should have a function. When people are appointed to certain positions, they should not be accepted for those positions until they have been vetted in this institution or until the senators have had a little go at them to determine whether they have the qualifications and whether the appointment is justified. I will not say anything about that subject either, except that it amounts to the adoption in our system of another American practice. We have had far too many such adoptions and amendments. We are moving too rapidly and too closely to the American model. I do not think that that function ought to be attributed to this body.

Finally, the committee recommended that the Speaker of the Senate should be elected by the Senate. You will be relieved to know that at last they have made a recommendation of which I thoroughly approve. I believe that such a proposal is consistent and proper, and I say that with no animosity toward the present Speaker in any way. He is the most recent example of a person appointed by the Prime Minister of the country. That is the way the law is and that is the way it should have been done. What we are discussing here is how we can improve the system and make better laws. I believe that this body is more capable of choosing the appropriate person to preside over it than a man who does not come here, who does not believe in this place, who advocates its abolition and who has always said—at least, up until the time he appointed the last eight senators—that the Senate is not worth a damn. “Not worth a damn” is my phrase; the Prime Minister is not that rude. He might say, “Mangez de la merde” because a lot of people do not speak French and would not know what he was saying. What I am saying is that the man who is charged by law to make appointments to fill the seats in this chamber not only does not believe in its efficacy or validity but also believes that there should be no such chamber.

I conclude as I began, by saying that the debate that has raged about reform of the Senate has raged ever since Confederation became a reality. It will continue to rage. At the moment it rages in terms of the recommendations of this report. I do not know the outcome. I only plead with you that, when the time comes to vote, you vote for the future of this Senate on the basis of what your reason and intelligence tell you, not simply because you believe that what you are voting for is the wish of some other person.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before closing the debate I advise you that I will yield to any senator who wishes to speak on this subject.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED “THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS”—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, January 31, 1984, moved:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to certain activities of the National Film Board and, in particular, to the film “The Kid Who Couldn't Miss”.

He said: Honourable senators, I gave notice of this inquiry because I am deeply concerned about the production of a film by the National Film Board, an agency of the government, entitled, “The Kid Who Couldn't Miss.”

In this my concern is apparently shared by many thousands of good citizens of this country, manifested by resolutions passed by the Royal Canadian Air Force Association, by Canadian Legion branches and by others. It has also been noted in the media with some disapproval. An article by William Stevenson from Washington, D.C., published in the Toronto Sun, states in part:

The story of Canada's ace fighter pilot, Billy Bishop of Owen Sound, Ontario has just unfolded across U.S. TV screens in such a perversely distorted fashion that a Washington Times editor thought it should prompt a declaration of war by outraged Canadians.

The article goes on:

In this version, Billy Bishop is presented as a liar who claimed more aerial victories in World War I than he could justify. He shot bullets into his own tail to win the Victoria Cross. He shot down nonexistent German planes where nobody else could see him. He was a lousy flyer. He strutted through World War II decked out as a top-ranking airforce officer but he was better known for his boozing.

The articles continues.

The federal government of Canada will not declare war on the United States for ridiculing one of our great war heros in this way because our own bureaucracy produced the self-proclaimed "documentary". The National Film Board sold this 90-minute abortion to U.S. National Public Broadcasting. The content was entirely Canadian. It was televised the night after a Canadian Embassy party here to sponsor "a seminar on Canadian documentary films."

Americans can be forgiven for supposing we take no pride in accomplishing anything. The National Film Board portrayal of Billy Bishop was billed as a documentary when in fact much of it was filmed at the entirely fictional musical play called "Billy Bishop Goes to War". The National Film Board documentary contained shots from war movies identified by several U.S. television editors. A Soviet film-maker recognized a famous scene from a World War II Russian movie of "Stalingrad under Siege."

Billy Bishop in reality commanded the respect of Germany's great ace, Baron von Richthofen. The Red Baron emerged from the NFB studies covered in both honour and glory. "Is it possible for Canadians to go further in self-hatred?" asked a bewildered U.S. News and World Report editor, formerly a foreign correspondent with considerable regard for Canadian diplomats. "You damn your own man with faint praise and swallow the myths of your enemies. The NFB tore Bishop to shreds more effectively than any German Fokker."

Original signed documents are on file in the Public Records Office, Kew, London, and in the Imperial War Museum, London, England verifying Bishop's achievements. However, these apparently were disregarded in producing this film. A manufactured character, supposed to be Bishop's mechanic, suggested that the raid which won Bishop the V.C. never occurred; that Bishop went out in the pre-dawn, flew around, landed somewhere and shot bullets from his own machine gun into the tail of his own aircraft in order to claim success in the raid of June 2, 1917.

It appears that the producer also claims that a World War I Royal Flying Corps pilot called "James", in a tape-recorded interview which is in the custody of the Imperial War Museum, inferred that the raid by Bishop never happened. The past president of the Royal Canadian Air Force Association, Colonel A. J. Bauer, C.D., has made this statement to me:

I have heard the tape referred to and I have a transcript of it and at no time did 'James' (nor did the interviewer of 'James', David Lance) mention the raid at Estourmel. 'James' did say, however, that Bishop was fraudulent. When he was asked by the interviewer, Lance, 'How did you discover that?' 'James' replied, 'It became common knowledge.'

There is, however, no verification of fraud either at the time or at any time since. These rumours sound rather as if they were either spiteful or jealous, and I find it more than distressing that a government agency would make these charges without concrete proof. It seems to be particularly distressing if, as alleged, a lot of the material inserted into this pseudo-documentary is completely fictional or unrelated.

In a letter of January 31, 1984, addressed to the Honourable Francis Fox, Minister of Communications, with copies to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of National Defence, the Royal Canadian Air Force Association, with over 20,000 members across Canada, made this statement:

The film narrator deduces that because no German record of Bishop's raid can be found, the raid did not take place. In fact, the Victoria Cross raid on June 2, 1917 was verified in three ways: German pilots captured soon after the raid confirmed that it had occurred as stated by Bishop. Secondly, British Intelligence personnel behind the lines confirmed that it had occurred. And, thirdly, a Royal Flying Corps pilot flew over the German aerodrome Estourmel after the raid to verify the claim.

The producer of this film is quoted in the press as saying that he "was merely trying to suggest that generals who run wars have to create heroes in order to sell those wars to the public." This objective of the producer, which basically is to tell us that war is horrible, is perfectly understandable and not one with which most of us would disagree. On the other hand, one is tempted here to get into the philosophical discussion as to whether wars are created by generals, or by politicians, or by arms manufacturers, so-called "merchants of death"; but this is not my point here. One cannot argue with the wish to make people realize that war is horrible. A young man such as this producer could quite easily collect a great many photographs and films of war scenes to demonstrate his point: war is horrible.

However, no matter how much those who have seen war agree with him, any good veteran, any good Canadian would disagree that, in making the point, one is privileged to resort to the character assassination of one of our great Canadian heroes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: The film, of course, is about Air Marshal William Avery Bishop, V.C., D.S.O. and bar, M.C., D.F.C. and many foreign decorations. He is historically recorded as being the second greatest allied ace in the air war of 1914-18. This film, in showing scenes to prove that war is horrible, that heroes are made to justify the generals' existence, tries to convince the world by suggesting that Bishop was a fraud and a cheat. History does not substantiate this charge. The records stand and certainly do not justify this approach. My point is that if one is to be accused of some wrongdoing, then I think that proof must be presented and that proof must be strong. In this case, the whole film is full of suggestion and no proof is ever presented. On the contrary, there is very considerable proof that Bishop was neither a fraud, nor a cheat, nor a liar.

The film is in circulation. It has been sold to public television in the United States; it is being shown throughout the country, and our Canadian consulates and embassies in many places are making a very happy occasion of showing the handiwork of our National Film Board. We have to accept the fact that a production by the National Film Board has, to many people, the authority of government backing. Even if this was not always true within this country, it is certainly true outside of the country, and if one thinks of any European, African or Asian country, it is understandable that the name "the National Film Board of Canada" would suggest a government production.

The circulation of this film should not be permitted. The film, in fact, is critical of many of our great traditional values. It makes people who fought in the wars look like fools, or rather weak-minded, to become involved in such a nasty business. It even brings the late King George V into question. There is a snide situation where Bishop is to be presented with the Victoria Cross, the Distinguished Service Order and the Military Cross, all at one time, at an investiture at Buckingham Palace by the King, where the film narrator says:

The King expressed a long-held desire to present all these three greatest decorations at one time to one person.

Then he adds:

The King usually gets what he wants.

The suggestion there is very obviously that, in the case of Bishop, the wish of the King to present three decorations at one time has a bearing on whether Bishop earned or did not earn his Victoria Cross and other decorations. That is a cheap shot.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: The film itself is composed of long sequences from the musical "Billy Bishop Goes to War". That play amused people here in Canada for some months and poked considerable fun at Bishop, but did not include the nasty innuendos of this film. In addition to the scenes from the musical, the film has many clips from both World War I and World War II, on the ground and in the air, and I think probably some old American movies, but it is well put together. It shows lots of men being blown up and being buried in the mud in Flanders, and all the horror scenes which go to emphasize that war is horrible. Then it has lots of generals in odd scenes and also the King. It did not prove to me personally that heroes were made to help the generals justify the war. The message really rather escapes me but, apart from the libellous charges against Bishop, I would not call the film really bad in any other sense. It might not be everyone's cup of tea, but that again is not my point.

My whole point is that, in the course of making this film, the producer-director has used the complete destruction of Billy Bishop's character as a hero, or even as an honest man, to prove his message. Bishop emerges as a fraud and a cheat. It also brings into question the awarding of the Victoria Cross and other top decorations for gallantry and bravery. It sneers at the whole tradition of the country's youth volunteering to fight for their country—whether war is justified or not. It downgrades our history; it is actually anti-Canadian; and I feel very strongly that it should not continue in its present form.

• (1620)

Now, what should be done about it? Last week I was told that in the Official History of the Canadian Air Force—a book which has been out for some years — there is a statement to the effect that no official confirmation of Bishop's raid of June 2, 1917 had been obtainable. This warning put me on my guard, so I took the trouble of calling the official historian, Dr. S. F. Wise, now Dean of Graduate Studies at Carleton University. Dr. Wise told me that there was in fact no German record of the raid because the German records were either destroyed or lost or, in any case, were not available. He went on to say, however, that from his investigations, his knowledge of the character of the man and from all the people he had spoken to, he was convinced that the claims by Bishop were not exaggerated. I do not think it is possible to get any better confirmation. At least, let me repeat, there is definitely no confirmation of the charge that the raid did not take place.

Honourable senators, I met many people who knew Billy Bishop. Bill Barker—who was awarded the Victoria Cross for astounding exploits during the war, when he took on, in succession, about sixty German airplanes, I believe, and was wounded five times—went into partnership with Bishop to start an airline from Toronto to Muskoka in 1920 or 1922. I have forgotten the exact year. Bill Barker was a normal, healthy farm lad, and I do not think he would have associated with a fraud or a cheat. He certainly had every opportunity to know whether Bishop was good, bad or indifferent.

A great admirer of Billy Bishop was Air Marshal Breadner, who, for some time during the war, was Chief of the Air Staff in Ottawa. Breadner thought very highly of Bishop. Another of Bishop's great friends was Eddy Rickenbacker, who was the great American ace who started and was head of Eastern Airlines for many years. Do you think Eddy Rickenbacker would have associated with a fraud?

Another person I knew quite well was an amusing character called Elliot White Springs. He wrote the book War Birds. He was one of an American group who formed a squadron during the First World War which did a lot of shooting and had a lot of fun. He wrote a most amusing book which he dedicated on the fly page from a speakeasy in New York, which rather shows his type of humour. Some of you may remember advertisements in the New Yorker magazine of quite a few years ago when Elliot Springs owned the Springs Cotton Mills in the United States. The theme of those advertisements was, "You cannot go wrong on a Springmaid sheet," or something of that sort, or, "A Buck well spent on a Springmaid sheet." He was a delightful fellow, a good author, a fine and decorated pilot and, again, a great admirer of Billy Bishop.

Finally, someone else I knew—and I am not sure whether he is still alive—was Lord Balfour. Lord Balfour was a pilot in the First World War, a most distinguished one who continued to fly for 50 years. During the Second World War he was the Secretary of State (Air). He said that he fully believed that Bishop did what he said. I just mention those people because I have spoken to them and have known them.

I come back to the object of my participation in this matter. I ask you: What are we trying to do? Can a government agency or a government department be guilty of paying no attention to the Charter of Rights? Can it be possible that they disregard the elementary rule of law that states that each of us is innocent until proven guilty? Or is it all just a mistake? If it is a mistake, it is very simple to say so and to correct it in the way I will suggest. Surely, it cannot be the wish of our government to use these very doubtful means to destroy a man who has been a hero to so many of our youths and who, with all the faults he may have had, has never been proven to be other than honourable.

For some reason, in Canada we love to cut people down to size. We like the thought of true democracy, of universality, that no one is better than his fellow man. All of this sounds fine, and I suppose it is perfectly plausible, but in the course of working at it we have so often knocked down people who have stood out among us; we have tried to level ourselves off by cutting off the head and bringing the body down to the waist. This is probably why we are so often described as a grey race, a dull race, a race of compromisers.

We should be shouting from the rooftops about the achievements which give us pride in ourselves, instead of letting petty ideas prevail.

Honourable senators, let us at least try to make the most of all of our genuine heroes, the great people we have had in this country, the great deeds that have been accomplished and, above all, the valour and honour and sacrifice of all those young men and women who joined the forces in defence of what they believed to be right.

I would really have enjoyed praising the National Film Board rather than being critical, because the National Film Board has produced excellent films which have been a credit to our country. In this case I can only suggest that there has been an unfortunate misdirection of effort.

The Royal Canadian Air Force Association and other veterans' bodies have requested that the film be banned. I think that is a reasonable request. However, it is probable that some other giant killer will cry censorship, so I suggest that the National Film Board be requested by the minister to withdraw this film for full editing, to cut out all unsubstantiated charges of fraud or lying, and that the minister request the Department of External Affairs to stop immediately the showing of the film in our consulates and embassies until it is properly edited.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I hope to find in the Senate a substantial body of agreement with my recommendation, and I hope that I will see some sign of support forthcoming.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I rise in support of the initiative expressed in the eloquent words of the Honourable Senator Molson. There are those in our midst who seem to take a perverse delight in being—as they term it—“iconoclasts” attempting to destroy reputations. They attempt to destroy the reputations of those in public life; they attempt to destroy the reputations of people who have served in the military; they attempt to destroy the reputations of great peacemakers in the world; they attempt to destroy the work and reputation of great philosophers. That is their way of achieving publicity, gaining some small degree of notoriety to fulfil some sort of murky, deep-rooted psychological need.

At times these attacks take the form of “frontal assaults” on reputations and massive denunciations of famous lives. Other attacks are made by innuendo and made more skillfully and perhaps more carefully. All of these attacks have one factor in common, however—they are inevitably launched after the victim has been dead and buried for some time.

And, honourable senators, another great friend of Billy Bishop's was Raymond Collishaw, who died not too long ago on the west coast. Senator Molson has spoken today of an attack taking place 70 years after the event—an attempt to discredit after generations of writers have looked at all aspects of Bishop's life, have placed that commendable life under the microscope, and have written many articles and books, almost all of them favourable. Now, in 1984, almost 70 years after the event, Canada's National Film Board, supported richly by the taxpayers of Canada, has created a work the effect of which is to destroy the reputation of a person who was buried with full military honours by his grateful country.

Billy Bishop served this country in war and served this country during peace time. He was a great help to the Canadian recruiting effort and the Canadian forces during the Second World War. He is not here to answer for himself, and does not have kin well placed to answer charges of this kind.

I was in New York just before Christmas and I was told by a number of our representatives how delighted and pleased they were that Canada was able to sell this particular production to Public Television so that all of the United States could view it. I doubt whether any of them had seen it themselves at the time. That is really quite incredible. Can one imagine ABC, Public Television, CBS or NBC in the United States doing a two-hour alleged exposé on the life of Edward Rickenbacker, the American counterpart of Billy Bishop? It would be unthinkable that a great national hero like Rickenbacker would be attacked by one writer who had not investigated the facts thoroughly and fairly.

Billy Bishop was an outstanding and courageous airman, and there are many other airmen from World War I and World War II who fall into that category. The reputations of some, like Bishop's, have been under attack. Most of them are from World War I. The fact is that many from World War II are still alive to defend themselves.

On the enemy side, Baron Manfred von Richthofen's record is under assault with the allegation that he really did not shoot down over 90 planes. Some of the other "aces" of World War I have similarly been attacked. There is even a book on the market claiming that Captain Roy Brown, the great Canadian aviator who shot down Baron von Richthofen, really did not shoot him down at all; that it was a stray rifle bullet from the ground. Someone will suggest next that a chap in the woods fired at a partridge in the sky and hit Baron von Richthofen, the "Red Baron", by mistake.

I suppose this will earn a few dollars for some author who believes that any charge outrageous enough will serve to market his book. Perhaps this is the price that has to be paid by those who achieve a reputation in certain fields. There are attempts now to discredit people like Churchill, Roosevelt and Kennedy. Efforts were made after Lincoln's death to destroy his reputation. The reputations of some of our great Canadian politicians, such as John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, have gone through the same process to one extent or another. I think we have to recognize the Bishop incident for what it is—a badly based assault on one of the great heroes of Canadian military history. I think that the Senate, of all bodies in this country, should rally around the initiative suggested by Senator Molson, and make certain that now, when Billy Bishop is no longer able to defend his country, we defend him.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

AFFAIRS OF THE AGED

MOTION TO ESTABLISH DIVISION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, January 31, 1984, moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the establishment of a Division of the Affairs of the Aged, with responsibility, insofar as the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, for promoting the welfare of aged people in Canada by

- (i) planning and helping to plan Government of Canada policies on the affairs of the aged, in particular, in the areas of human rights, income security, employment, retirement and public services, including housing, nutrition, health care, education and recreation;
- (ii) administering such Acts of the Parliament of Canada and such orders and regulations of the Government of Canada as are assigned to it;
- (iii) coordinating policies, in both the public and private sectors, affecting the aged;
- (iv) carrying out research and dispensing information on the affairs of the aged; and
- (v) engaging in such other activities as are considered conducive to this goal by the Governor-in-Council.

He said: Honourable senators, I have a document entitled "Poverty Line Update." I ask permission to have it printed as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Croll: Seventeen years ago the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging was adopted. I thought it was about time it was updated. I wanted to do the updating and I spoke to the Leader of the Government and to his deputy and they said "No," with a vengeance. Therefore, we have the motion before us.

At that time, the report recommended that the age at which one should be eligible for a pension be reduced from 70 to 65 and, in addition, that an allowance be made payable to those pensioners. The government agreed to that and, as well, the supplement we recommended was accepted. The government has indicated that it is going to increase the supplement shortly.

I want to update the report with particular emphasis on women. Poverty in this country is still an issue that mainly concerns women. We have a new generation of older people. The recession and inflation have been hard on pensioners. Statistics clearly indicate that three-fifths of the elderly women living in this country live below the poverty line. Single women are less affected by poverty. Statistics show that women live longer than men. On the average, women live until the age of 77, whereas men only live to the age of 71. We may say that economic recovery is on the way, but soup kitchens still have long lines and it is not uncommon even to see children in these lines. It seems that real problems start for the elderly between the ages of 60 and 65. If those people are awaiting a pension to aid them, unfortunately they are going to have a long wait because our pension legislation is only in the embryonic stage. But these women need immediate relief; so what I propose is changing the age for eligible pensions for women from age 65 to age 60.

In Switzerland, women are pensioned at age 63 and men at age 65; in Canada both men and women are pensioned at age 65; in Israel it is age 60 for both sexes; in the U.K. it is age 60 for women and age 65 for men; in the German Democratic Republic the women are pensioned at age 60 and the men at 65; in the German Federal Republic the women are pensioned at age 60 and the men at age 65; in Belgium the ages are 60 and 65; in Greece the ages are 57 and 62; in the U.S.S.R. the ages are 55 and 60; in Japan 55 and 60; in Hungary 55 and 60; and in Yugoslavia it is 55 and 60.

I felt the time had come for us to investigate this matter and to bring into the open the needs of elderly women, who are not as poor as church mice, but are poorer than church mice. These elderly people always suffer in silence. They need a spokesman. We have played that role for them before and we must do it again.

Honourable senators, I should also like to draw to your attention the universality of pensions. Under the present government, that concept is safe. Although it has been challenged, Prime Minister Trudeau has said the situation will not change.

Elderly people are constantly under attack from the dollar boys, who say there should be a means test. In 1952 we did away with the means test, and our procedure is well-documented in a book written about the Honourable Stanley Knowles, with whom I had the honour to serve on the committee that made that finding. The argument against universality is lost when one realizes that the concept of universality of pensions is broader than the concept of saving money.

We should consider having available to us statistics on poverty every three months. At the present time they are made available to us once a year and most of us give them merely a cursory glance. These statistics should be produced often enough that we can assess the situation on a quarterly basis.

The most important aspect of this resolution with which I wish to deal concerns lowering the pensionable age of women. The resolution is to place before Parliament every aspect of social activity in this country.

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to comment at length on the report of the Special Joint Committee on Reform of the Senate, but I would note that it does revive some memories. It is now 30 years since Senators Cameron, Molson, Inman, McGrand and I came to the Senate. We now share the honoured title of "elder statesmen." When we were appointed, the first words that rang in our ears was the cry, "Abolish the Senate." It seemed at the time that that was the only concern of the country. We had few defenders. We did not hold our breaths waiting for the Senate to be abolished; we went about our business.

Although in those days the Senate was not a very active body, it did conduct itself in a dignified fashion. Most of its business was easily done by the leaders. The Senate never missed a closing date. If a piece of legislation was needed in a hurry, it would be studied a little less intensely, with one short speech from each side, in order to meet the closing date. In those days the committees performed their work painstakingly carefully. However, in those days, the government was always right. I don't know if it is any less right today.

When I joined the Senate, the bulk of the work we had to deal with concerned the granting of divorces. At that time, Quebec and Newfoundland had no provincial statutes governing divorce, and people from those provinces were compelled to apply to the Senate for divorce. Senator Roebuck, who was the chairman of the divorce committee, was very able and competent. In those days, a Roman Catholic would be reluctant to sit on the committee dealing with divorce, and, of course, not too many Protestants felt like sitting on such a busy committee.

From 1955 until the legislation was changed, the committee dealt with 6,253 divorce applications. Since people's personal lives were involved, it dealt with each divorce separately and carefully.

One of the complications the Senate often had to deal with was the fact that in the province of Quebec no provision for maintenance was made. People would apply for divorce without having made any provision for maintenance, and, yet, if the grounds were there, the divorce could not be denied.

• (1650)

Then they got the Croll formula. I would not deliver judgment. I would reserve judgment until I made sure that some provisions were made for the children, where there were children. I caused some decisions to be held up for as long as a year, until the petitioners got smart and would not come in without having made such provisions. That was our only method of dealing with the situation at that particular time. I am a lawyer and I had the responsibility of hearing contested cases, which were difficult to deal with because there were always problems involving money and family.

Honourable senators, the divorce committee had to meet on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and even on Fridays, when the Senate was not sitting, in order to handle the number of cases that came before it. In one year we dealt with 1,304 cases. Honourable senators can appreciate, in light of that, how important it was that the Senate should operate in the way it did. I find it disturbing, therefore, that the Senate does not always accommodate committees.

The Senate's duty is to sit on its designated days, and I think that should continue to be the case so that it can conduct whatever business it has before it. There is a dignity, a history, a culture and a timelessness about the Senate. Consider the prayer, the parade; there is something of value in those traditions that will be lost, if we make certain changes. But in certain respects, honourable senators, the Senate has already changed for the better. Question Period has made the sittings very interesting, albeit it has brought politics into things as never before. It might be true that in the past there were a dozen Conservatives on the other side—there never were any more than that—but we never had any difficulty with them. Although they may have voted one way and we the other, to all intents and purposes we dealt with one another in a satisfactory manner.

One of the most progressive changes made in the Senate is the arrangement for the pre-study of the subject matter of a bill. This gives us time to meet the wishes of all those who want to express their views. Real progress, however, is to be seen in our investigative reports prepared by special committees established to do investigative work.

Another change for the better concerns the attendance; in the old Senate it was lax; it is not so today. We are more sophisticated now, and I think we spread ourselves across the community.

Honourable senators, I found it difficult to understand the words of Senator George McIlraith, a very distinguished man, to the effect that most senators are too old to sit or too lazy to watchdog the House of Commons. He once stated that most are too politically compromised even to bark. Well, he was not thinking of me, because I have done a lot of barking. My impression of today's Senate, however, is that it is a very good working body. Honourable senators, I have known the Senate for 30 years. The people who come to the Senate come with the hope of serving—of doing something of value and of giving whatever they have to give. Sometimes they are provided the chance to do so, sometimes they are not.

Honourable senators, I do not understand the idea of patronage. I knew every senator appointed by the Conservative government. I knew every senator appointed by the Liberal government. I really saw no difference between the two groups. The men and women were equal in their capabilities.

As I said previously, it is the investigative effort that, in my view, has paid off. I have told honourable senators that when I became a senator I was dissatisfied; having been active in the House of Commons, I was looking for something to keep me more fully occupied. A secretary who used to work for me moved to Detroit to become the secretary of a senator in Michigan. I would see him from time to time and I came to have an idea of how the American Senate worked. What impressed me was its committee method of investigation. We did not have such a method in this country. I thought it was a good idea and I sold that idea to Senator MacDonald. He then sold the idea to Senator Haig.

I have with me today the first report of the Special Committee on Manpower, which was made in 1961. Of the members of that committee, Senator Cameron, Senator Inman and I are still about. The Senate thought that it should have a report on consumer credit, and the House of Commons, thinking that that was a good idea, proposed that we have a joint committee. We therefore established the Special Joint Committee on Consumer Credit, and I was joint chairman with the Honourable Ron Basford. As a result of the report of that committee, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was established, with the Honourable Ron Basford as its first minister. Senators Cook, Hastings, Inman, McGrand, Davey and I were on that committee. That was the first committee ever to travel across Canada, and we did not know what awaited us.

There then came into vogue the principle of truth in lending, by which it was necessary to tell people how much interest they had to pay for the money they borrowed. Senators would be surprised at the amount of resistance there was to that. Another report to emanate from the Senate was entitled "Child at Risk". I would point out that Senators Haig, Aseltine, Brooks, Macdonald, Connolly, Martin, Perrault and Flynn supported every one of these undertakings. The report on mandatory retirement also emanated from the Senate, but it was held up for a year at the request of Premier Davis of Ontario. During that period, as we reached out in various ways to the people, to consumers, the cry "Abolish" died down, and we heard less of it.

There was then the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada. Thirty thousand copies were sold and the report proved to be the most popular ever published by the Canadian Parliament. Senators Bélisle, Cook, Everett, Hastings, Inman, McGrand and Sparrow participated in that report, which was used as a textbook and as a reference right across this country. So great was the demand for it, that it was reprinted in 1972, 1974, 1976 and 1980.

Those reports established the credibility of the Senate. We had what might be called a constituency out there. We had old people and poor people, who looked to the Senate and would say, "They are our friends." Our recommendation for a guaranteed income was regarded as exciting. The important thing is that we never had a minority report. Our reports were always unanimous. It was never a question of the chairman doing this or that. Our reports always represented a total effort.

The original Fathers of Confederation created the Senate to represent regional interests and to monitor, correct and improve the legislative work of the House of Commons—as the house of sober second thought—and to protect the interests of property against surges of electoral populism. In those days no thought was given to welfare or social assistance. What was necessary was done by the churches or by voluntary groups, who did what they could. Today we have 1,356,000 women who receive the pension and approximately one million men.

The years between 1960 and 1980 were golden years for the Senate. We made an impact, we made an impression. We were doing something that was necessary, and the people knew it and appreciated it. At the present time we in the Senate have lost our way. We have no time for social measures. But we are not going to abandon the elderly and the poor. What is needed is a new direction. During the past three years we have suffered from neo-liberalism in the Senate. It is easily defined as flexible, pragmatic, a consensus, free of ideological baggage. But real liberalism has, as its ideology, justice with freedom, jobs, food, clothing, shelter, health and education. Those are the principles of our party and they have carried us through 50 years of office. We were the first to place welfare measures in our statute books, and the sort of liberalism that we practised yesterday, that we practise today, we shall practise tomorrow. We cannot afford to do anything less.

On February 3 all members of the Liberal Party received a document. I did not write it but I will tell honourable senators what it says:

The Liberal party has a long history as the party that protects Canadians who are most in need. The most recent public opinion polls show that the Liberal government has continued to hold the support of these Canadians.

The CROP Inc. poll, conducted between November 14 and December 5, 1983 shows that while Tory support is highest among Canadians in the 30 to 60 age group, this support declines significantly with those over 60. Liberal support has increased substantially with this age group.

The poll also revealed that the majority of those interviewed with annual family incomes of over $25,000 said that they would vote for the Conservatives. But those at the bottom of the income scale said they plan to vote for the Liberal Party.

It is no surprise that the Liberals have gained the confidence and support of the less fortunate groups in this country. The Liberal government was one of the few western governments not to cut back spending on social services during the difficult period of recession. The Liberal government has never shouldered Canadians in need with the burden of enduring economic hardship as a result of government restraint initiatives.

I am referring to an assessment by the Liberals of the political situation as they see it, and it is significant.

● (1710)

The Liberal government continues to consider the fight against poverty among the aged as their number one social priority.

That is not the feeling in this place. Somehow or other, we were absent when they handed out sensitivity. We need to make an about-face here in order to maintain the faith and confidence of the people and to show them that we are working for them all the time, or else we will once again become irrelevant. Since 1980, not one social measure has appeared on the agenda of this chamber. That is unheard of.

This resolution will invite all honourable senators to participate in a debate on this problem, to discuss it freely and to arrive at some conclusions. We must remember that we are dealing with people and voters and that we cannot divorce them from our party. This memorandum I have referred to comes from the other place. Do honourable senators realize that it is only 27 steps through the Hall of Honour to the House of Commons? Yet one would think we are living in two different worlds. We have done nothing in the last three years and it is time we should.

On motion of Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SOIL AND WATER CONSERVATION

Leave having been given to proceed to Motion No. 3:

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow, pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 2, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine the subject-matter of soil and water conservation throughout Canada;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR AUTHORIZATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow, pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 2, 1984,, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to hear submissions from representatives of agricultural, fisheries, forestry and related industries; and

That the Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required to carry out its mandate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if Senator Sparrow does not wish to add anything, I will remind you that during Question Period, in answer to a question by Senator Marshall, I said there is an aspect to this motion that I should like to look into. Therefore, either I can move that the motion be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for examination or, if Senator Sparrow wishes to make some comments on the matter, I can adjourn the debate and speak to it on Thursday, after I have had a chance to look into the pertinent part.

Senator Sparrow: I have a question for the acting leader. Is he suggesting that he will adjourn the debate now, and present a motion referring the matter to the Standing Rules and Orders Committee?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can either move the motion in amendment now and adjourn the debate, or give notice of the motion in amendment for Thursday, thus giving me and other honourable senators an opportunity to look into the matter.

Another way to handle it, of course, is to move the motion in amendment now, and adjourn the debate on the main motion. In order to move the motion in amendment, I need leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SUBJECT MATTER OF MOTION REFERRED TO STANDING RULES AND ORDERS COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in amendment, I move:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for consideration and report.

Honourable senators, Senator Sparrow and I have discussed this matter. The motion that he has moved is consistent with a precedent established by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, as it then was. The purport of the motion is to allow the committee to summon and hear witnesses with respect to questions that are properly within the mandate of the committee. The mandate of that committee has since been expanded; it is now the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry.

My concern, which I wish to make very clear, is that Senator Sparrow is proposing a motion that would allow his committee to hear witnesses, if they happened to be in town, or to call witnesses, if that were thought necessary, on the general terms of the mandate, as opposed to a specific reference. That is something the committee has done in the past. Honourable senators will remember that the rules provide that, except for the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders and the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, all committees require a reference from the Senate in order to undertake activity. Of course, a corollary to that is that a committee with such a reference naturally establishes a budget, where necessary, in order to carry out whatever reference it receives. The budget then goes before the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee and the proposed expenditures must be approved by that committee. The reference itself must be established by a vote of the Senate.

These are matters I think we should look into. The powers of the committees come on reference by the Senate and, if motions of this kind apply to all committees, then, in effect, we are taking a large and important section out of the rules and are changing our procedures. For this reason I have moved an amendment to Senator Sparrow's motion, in order that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders may consider the implications a motion of this kind may have.

Hon. Jack Marshall: So far as I understand the motion, I have no objection to it. However, I can see the same sort of thing happening with other expanded committees. I am referring specifically to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. To that committee has been added the consideration of youth affairs, consumer affairs and housing. Is this motion creating a precedent, which will be followed in the case of the social affairs committee and any other committee that might be expanded in the future?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is my concern, honourable senators. Other committees with expanded terms of reference, which have never asked for this particular type of reference before, might now come and do so. It is the implication of the motion that I would like the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to examine. It may be that the rules committee will come to the conclusion that this is a desirable measure. If the committee reports and recommends to the Senate that it is prepared to give such references, then that is fine. But it is a matter that requires some looking into.

Senator Marshall: I would like to say that, as a result of a meeting of the steering committee last week, there seems to be a question of urgency with respect to the passing of this motion, since salaries of some of the employees are held up because of this change.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is correct.

Senator Marshall: I would like to impress upon the acting leader that the matter be looked into this week so that we can overcome the very serious problem I have outlined.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have spoken to Senator Sparrow with respect to this aspect. I am aware of the concern. As a matter of fact, Senator Sparrow drew it to the attention of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration some time ago. I have spoken to Senator Graham, the chairman of that committee, to Senator McElman, the deputy chairman, and to Senator Sparrow about finding an alternative solution to that problem while we are looking into this one. I hope that matter can be solved by tying the staff problem to the order of reference we have already granted about soil and water conservation.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I do not want to speak on the motion at the moment. However, I would like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government a question. The motion provides that we could hear submissions from those interested in the agriculture industry, as we have in the past. A number of organizations have appeared before the committee, such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. While we are waiting for a report from the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, does the committee have the power to hear submissions in the meantime? I appreciate that a motion relating to the soils industry in Canada has just been passed. However, that does not cover the beef industry and the many other organizations in the agricultural industry that have requested to appear before the committee while they are in town. I ask the acting leader whether, under the present rules, he believes that we have the power to hear submissions from interested parties.

Senator Frith: No, I think not. That is why I hope Senator Sparrow will be able to tell the committee of his experience and why I think he needs certain powers of the type he has described. Perhaps a different wording could be found for the motion in order to make a reference that would allow him to do so.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to argue with that interpretation. The terminology in the rules as applied to committees is for a reference by the Senate—"reference" implying a study. There certainly are precedents to be followed. If there is a representative of an organization in Ottawa and it is felt desirable to hear that representative, then I do not think a special reference from the Senate would be required to hear that representative on a particular subject—that is, if it is not a study being undertaken by the Senate. As always, I could be wrong. I keep looking at my revered friend across the chamber, Senator Molson, who may have a word to say on this subject. Certainly, there are precedents for hearing testimony without undertaking a particular reference of study.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have never considered myself to be the best interpreter of the rules. From past experience I would say it has always seemed wise to have the referral rule because of the wide range of subjects that could possibly come up. The range of subjects is limitless. The moment you are committed to dealing with any phase of one of these subjects, then you must obviously have a budget. We have two complications in this case. One motion refers to soil and water conservation. The other motion deals with hearing submissions from representatives of agriculture, fisheries, forestry and related industries. With respect to the soil and water conservation, that seems to me to be one thing. However, as to hearing submissions from any representatives of agriculture, fisheries and forestry, that is so wide in scope that there is a danger of implications that could be repeated in other committees. That would mean that there would be no limit to the range of subjects that committees could consider without reference. I think that concept should receive very careful consideration.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate on main motion adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 9, 1984 at 2 p.m.

STATISTICS CANADA: Lines are based on changing consumption patterns which now indicate that families who spend 62% or more of their income on food, clothing and shelter (as opposed to the 70% criterion used at an earlier date) are in straitened circumstances. These limits are also differentiated by size of area of residence.

Also, according to Statistics Canada figures, the lowest 20% of families and unattached individuals (lowest income quintile) received only about 4.5% of total income in 1982. In contrast, the highest 20% of families and unattached individuals (highest income quintile) received about 42% of total income, or about 10 times as much as the lowest quintile.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE LATE HON. ALLISTER GROSART, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we enter into the business of the day I should like to have the privilege of saying a word about our colleague, the Honourable Allister Grosart, Privy Councillor, former senator and sometime Speaker of this house. In the name of my party and in my own name, I offer to his wife and the members of his family sincere condolences on his passing. I know that in doing so I speak not only for those of us on this side of the house but for all who knew him in and outside this chamber.

Allister Grosart was a careful legislator. He took very seriously the duties of this house in the revision of legislation that came before it, and he made many distinguished contributions to improving the laws of the country. He was thoughtful and provocative in committee, where we have an opportunity to develop some of the ideas which are, perhaps, not germane to our work in this house. Allister Grosart made a solid reputation for himself as a man who had something to say that was worth listening to in the work of the committees of the Senate.

Withal, he was a modest man although, if I may use the biblical encomium, he was certainly well furnished with ability, and that we have good reason to know. But more than those abilities he was imbued with the spirit of Parliament, not only as it originated in the United Kingdom but particularly as it developed in Canada. In particular, he understood the ethos of this chamber, which is why I think he made a distinguished mark for himself as the Speaker of this house. Had fortune dictated otherwise, and had his tenure in that post been longer than it was, I am certain he would have made an even greater mark as the president of our assembly.

I think of him, however, in the days before he reached the Senate. I think of his work in Canadian and public affairs, getting on for 25 years ago now, when this country was longing for new ideas, new inspiration and new men. Allister Grosart was there as one of the movers and shakers who brought about a significant change of development and thrust in the political life of our country. He did that as a member of a political organization; but he did it in such a manner that he commanded the respect of all who knew him. He set a standard for public virtue in this calling which I think is seldom matched. He had a sense of responsibility; he had a standard of conduct. He had an integrity which I think preaches a self-evident lesson to all of us who are engaged in the political process, either in public office or within the party ranks, as we now approach what may be a similar climactic period in the political history of our country.

Allister Grosart's record is the monument to his memory, and it needs no elaboration by anyone in this house. So I say to his family who survive him that we in this chamber offer our sincere, heartfelt condolences on the occasion of his passing and our grateful remembrance of a life well spent.

Honourable senators, perhaps I should also say, for those of you who may not know, that Allister Grosart's funeral will take place on Saturday. Arrangements are being made for a plane to take to Toronto members of this chamber and others who wish to attend his funeral. Those wishing to attend may contact the office of the Leader of the Government, or the office of the Leader of the Opposition, and arrangements will be made to accommodate them.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Liberal party and the senators on this side of the house, I associate myself with everything that Senator Roblin has said, and add a few memories and impressions of my own, some of them covering the same events referred to by Senator Roblin.

Senator Grosart first became important to me when he was playing what might be called an adversarial role to that being played about that time by Senator Davey, Senator Lang, Senator Stanbury and me. Although he was not at that time a senator, he was a famous communicator and a famous political activist and organizer. As Senator Roblin has said, he brought his own style and class to that role and, in a way, started a new age of political organization and communication in Canada. He was, as we know, credited with making an extremely important contribution to the election of Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

I remember him also through friends we shared in the advertising business. He had an excellent reputation as a businessman, an advertiser and communicator, so it was quite a privilege and an important experience for me to finally meet him here for the first time.

Senator Grosart, as Senator Roblin has said, really did live a life to be celebrated, and, while we mourn his death, we, as fellow senators and fellow Canadians, can justly celebrate his life. He made, through this chamber, a significant contribution to Parliament over a long period of time, both before and after I came to this chamber. He was well known abroad, as many of you realize from being asked about his health when you were travelling. Around the world, in Commonwealth nations and others, he was known as a staunch, expert and sensitive parliamentarian; a supporter of the parliamentary system; a supporter of the Commonwealth; and a supporter of free governments and their institutions.

It is some consolation to know that, in his comparatively long life, he did achieve so many of his objectives and did, in fact, make such a widespread contribution. We express our condolences to his wife and daughters, and hope that they will understand that we, too, shall miss him, and that parliamentary institutions and governments around the world will also miss his contribution.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, as one who for several years bore some responsibility for organizational matters in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, I should like to take a moment to acknowledge with profound gratitude the debt that my party owes to the late Allister Grosart.

● (1410)

He played the leading role in the re-organization of the Conservative Party in the mid-1950s. He was instrumental in its electoral successes and, as national director, he gave the party a new and more democratic constitution. He insisted on the formation of constituency associations, and he laid down new rules to ensure that the nomination of candidates would be more open and democratic. His name was and always will be associated with that of the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, with that of the Honourable Mike Starr, and with those of other leading figures in the Conservative Party of that day.

In the mid-1950s and early 1960s, he encouraged the nascent political careers of such people as the Honourable Flora MacDonald, the Right Honourable Joe Clark and the Honourable Richard Hatfield, all of whom worked under his direction in the national organization.

For all of that, and for much, much more, including his loyalty and diligence as a public man, the late Allister Grosart will have a place of honour in the history of my party and of this chamber.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, more than ten years ago, when I was a comparatively new boy here, Senator Aird resigned from the Senate and, through a stroke of good fortune, I was elected chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

At that time I inherited, if I may use the term, the late Allister Grosart as my deputy chairman. He had been deputy chairman of the committee since 1969 and, indeed, continued to hold that position until he was appointed Speaker of the Senate.

In those early years, I would often stop by his office in the evening to seek advice on how best we might conduct the affairs of the committee. Invariably, after giving me sound advice, he would reach into that marvellous square box he kept in his office and offer me a drink. We would then discuss political campaigns of years past from our respective points of view. I might say that they were among the more memorable evenings of my life. Compared to him, I had little to contribute by way of anecdote.

The advice he gave me and his contribution to the work of the committee throughout the period when we undertook our study on Canada-United States relations—which resulted in the publication of a report in three volumes—were always outstanding. He was totally up to speed every time we had a meeting. He was a probing cross-examiner of witnesses, so much so that I thought he should have been a lawyer.

It was little enough that in the final volume of our report, as in previous volumes, I was able to say:

I know that all members of the Committee will wish to join with me in making special reference to Senator Allister Grosart, P.C., the Deputy-Chairman of this Committee from 1969 until his appointment as Speaker of the Senate in 1979. His perceptive questioning of witnesses, his unerring focus on the central issues and his wise counsel have all contributed in an important degree to the Committee's study.

The first two volumes of that report touched on—and, indeed, in Volume III we advocated—the very controversial step of bilateral free trade with the United States. As a west coaster, I suppose I might have been thought of as having no difficulty in espousing such heresy, as it was in those days, but whenever I wavered—and I did at times—Allister Grosart was always there to put the rod back in my back. He never wavered for a moment on this controversial subject. He saw the logic in our recommendations and supported them in every respect.

I might simply say that here we are, only six or seven years later, with, if not the whole concept adopted, at least a very large portion of it in the form of “sectoral” free trade now being discussed formally between the governments of Canada and the United States. I wish simply to share with him whatever credit there is relative to those reports.

I am proud to have had the privilege and honour of working with Allister Grosart for many years in this chamber. I regret that the funeral of Jimmy Sinclair, my political mentor for over 20 years before I knew Allister Grosart, falls on the same day and, therefore, on Saturday I shall be in Vancouver attending Mr. Sinclair's funeral rather than in Toronto attending our former colleague's funeral.

REPORT OF NATIONAL COUNCIL ON WELFARE

On the tabling of documents:

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order having to do with the tabling of documents. I noticed in today's Citizen an article dealing with the report of the National Council on Welfare on the incomes of the aged. I am surprised that the acting leader has not tabled that report. It came to my office approximately half an hour ago. As I have so often asked in years past, why are we the last to receive these communications? This is a very important report and I want to know why the press should receive it before parliamentarians.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will look into it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. George van Roggen, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized by the Senate to incur expenses for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters referred to it, reported, pursuant to rule 84, the expenses incurred by the committee during the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which was authorized by the Senate on June 12, 1980 to incur special expenses with respect to its inquiry into such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders and criminal behaviour in later life, reported, pursuant to rule 84, the expenses incurred by the committee during the First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LTD.—PETRO-CANADA—PRIVATIZATION

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, as the first item in Question Period I wish to amend an answer I gave to a question asked by Senator Donahoe during Question Period on February 7 last. The question had to do with Petro-Canada and concerned the matter of the Canadian ownership charge, and I replied that the act in question authorizing a wider use of those funds for energy purposes had passed through Parliament.

I confess to embarrassment at having made an error. On inquiry I discovered that my sense of anticipation was too large. These measures have not yet, in fact, been presented in the other place for consideration.

When questions were asked in the other place on February 3 by the Honourable George Hees and on January 31 by Miss Patricia Carney in this respect, the Minister of Finance announced that he would very shortly be considering the introduction of legislation.

In his budget address of April 19 last, the Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

It is the Government's intention to maintain the Canadian Ownership Special Charge at its current level and use the revenues in support of this objective.

By "this objective" Mr. Lalonde was referring to the objective of self-sufficiency through raising Canadian ownership of oil and gas resources by increasing exploration and development of new reserves.

These matters were, of course, discovered because I undertook to find the relevant portions of the legislation. Again, I would express my apologies to honourable senators, and in particular to Senator Donahoe. I assure you that it was not my intention to mislead. My enthusiasm for the measure remains as strong as ever. In believing that we had considered it in Parliament I was in error.

Honourable senators, I also answered other questions concerning the debate on the National Energy Program. As I said before, I was eager for the Senate to enter into that debate, but, since the legislation in question has not been passed, the opportunity for the Senate to consider the matters raised in Question Period last Tuesday will arise in the course of the debate on that legislation.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin.

As a result of comments made in this chamber, it appeared to me that Senator Austin not only agreed but was suggesting that the time had come for the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to do an in-depth study of the National Energy Program. I gather from his last response that he is now withdrawing from that particular position because the other legislation has not yet been presented. Frankly, I cannot see the relationship between the two matters, and I would be interested in knowing whether Senator Austin has the same feeling now as he expressed on Tuesday.

Senator Austin: I tried to convey my position in the answer I just gave. The National Energy Program is one of the most significant programs operating in the Canadian economy and, as I said in my response last Tuesday, I think a debate on the subject would be valuable.

If the Senate wishes to proceed through the vehicle of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, that would have my personal approval. I am simply indicating that there will, in any event, be an opportunity to raise these matters when the legislation relating to the Canadian Ownership Special Charge comes before this chamber.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to offer the opinion that Senator Buckwold's position is well taken. If we are to content ourselves with an examination of this new bill, which, according to advance notices, will break the previous pledges of the government—but we will see about that when we come to it—then, when that bill goes to committee, we will be restricted to discussing the terms of that bill. But it is only a very small part of the considerations I think should be examined in connection with the National Energy Program. Therefore, I think Senator Buckwold's suggestion, if I may describe it in that way, is good and that the energy committee should be seized of the totality of this problem so that a wide-ranging examination may be conducted. I hope that we proceed with it.

POVERTY

INCOME LEVELS OF UNATTACHED ELDERLY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development. I direct this question to him because it appears from a report of one of his departments that he is responsible for some 14 departments and, I believe, 22 agencies.

My question has to do with the income of the aged. I refer to a report of the National Council on Welfare entitled "Sixty-five and Over." It is indicated on page 24 of the report that in 1982 an estimated 98,000 elderly families—11.7 per cent of all those headed by a person 65 or older—have incomes below the poverty line. What is even more alarming is that, of the unattached elderly, evidently 57.7 per cent, or 422,000, are poor.

In my view, one of the most neglected groups in Canada today is made up of the unattached—such as the single women who are responsible for families. They do not seem to be recognized through increases in social assistance, old age pensions or programs having to do with widows' allowances. Although some headway has evidently been made, is it not time to concentrate on the unattached people in Canada, such as those to whom I refer, and to correct the inequities they find in their lifestyle?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I should like to commend Senator Marshall for his interest in and concern for this important matter respecting individuals and families living at, about or below the poverty level. This issue has the constant attention of both my committee of cabinet and the full cabinet. In response to Senator Marshall's question I can only say that, while we have made progress, as indicated by the report of the National Council on Welfare to the Minister of Health and Welfare, there is a good deal yet to be done.

Certainly, the issue of poverty, particularly with respect to that of single women, is of deepest concern. I am hopeful that some measures may be provided on February 15 in the budget address of the Minister of Finance.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

NOMINATION OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, we have been told that a number of members of Parliament suggested that Prime Minister Trudeau be nominated as a candidate for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Hon. Senators: Hear! Hear!

Senator Asselin: I have no objection at all. I would like to know whether the Acting Leader of the Government could produce a list of the members of Parliament who signed the petition recommending the Prime Minister for the Nobel Prize.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I do not have the list here but I will make the necessary enquiries. Senator Asselin, we could put your name on the list too, if you like!

SPORT

TORONTO—PROPOSED DOMED STADIUM

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Social Development. Has the minister any personal opinions about or any knowledge of federal studies having been done to ascertain whether a domed sport stadium could be erected on federal lands already partly occupied by the Canadian Armed Forces base and the de Havilland Aircraft Company, with its runways, in Downsview?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I want to begin my reply to the question of the possible construction of a domed stadium on federal land, particularly on land occupied by the de Havilland Aircraft Company Ltd., by saying that the report released by an official of the Government of Ontario was not discussed with me; nor was it discussed, in advance of its release, with any senior official or, indeed, anyone that I am aware of in the de Havilland corporation. However, if the Government of Ontario makes representations to the federal government concerning the choice of federal lands for a domed stadium in the Toronto area, then, of course, we shall be obliged to give the matter most careful consideration.

Senator Haidasz: As a supplementary, has any federal aid been offered so far, or will any be forthcoming, to assist in the construction of a domed sports stadium in the greater Metropolitan Toronto region?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, to my knowledge the federal government has not been officially approached by any official or agency of the Ontario provincial government, or at any civic level, although unofficially I have recently been made aware of various views expressed on this matter.

At present I cannot comment on what is possible in terms of any consideration given this matter by the federal government. I believe that the responsibility for any initiative belongs with the Government of Ontario, or an entity created by that government and invested with the authority to make an approach to the federal government. To my knowledge such an approach has not been made. However, if it is made, we will certainly give it careful consideration.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on this question of providing stadia, in the city of Winnipeg there is a joint project by the federal and provincial governments and the municipality for redevelopment of the city core. One of the important projects mentioned for inclusion in that redevelopment is the provision of a new stadium. If the federal government is in the stadium business in Toronto, I would be interested to know what it proposes to do in regard to Winnipeg, particularly as this is a joint federal, provincial and municipal proposal.

Will the minister ascertain whether the federal government has taken any position with respect to the stadium in the Winnipeg core area and whether it has made any proposal to the development authority with respect to it?

Senator Austin: I thank the honourable senator for his intervention. I will certainly take into account the interests of the city of Winnipeg, as well as those of the city of Vancouver and other Canadian communities, when considering the question of constructing a domed stadium in the city of Toronto.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, since the minister is currently involved in taking orders, may I mention the Centre 2000 in Sydney, Nova Scotia? The premier of the province has committed $3 million to that on the condition that the federal government will contribute its share of the cost. There has been a good deal of discussion and there have been many meetings between the local member of Parliament, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and federal government officials. However, nothing has evolved so far. It was hoped that the project would be completed in time for the two hundredth anniversary of the province in 1985. Perhaps the minister would be kind enough to look into this matter and advise whether the federal government is giving any consideration to making a commitment of financial support.

Senator Austin: I do not think that my "order book" is too heavy to add the honourable senator's request to the list of items I shall inquire into.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the domed stadium proposal by the committee of the Province of Ontario. I noticed, on reviewing the committee report briefly, that there is a reference or recommendation that a provincial crown corporation be established to operate and manage such an enterprise. I wonder whether the minister would satisfy himself, and perhaps this house, on whether or not it is appropriate for a provincial crown corporation to be managing an enterprise on federal lands and whether or not there is any legal impediment to such a provincial crown corporation.

Senator Austin: I should be pleased to look into the question of any possible legal impediment to a provincial crown corporation's constructing or operating a facility on federally-owned land.

As to the broader question Senator Grafstein has alluded to, I am unaware of whether the Government of Ontario has taken any decision, chosen a site or decided to allocate resources with respect to the matter. Honourable senators must be aware that, for the time being, the federal government lacks a good deal of information, including the information Senator Grafstein has suggested.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION—INTERIM REPORT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an interim report for Senator Phillips on the question he asked about the list of 844 projects in the Special Employment Initiatives Program and the allocation of funds to each project.

In the other place the honourable member for St. John's East has asked for the same list. His request and the request of Senator Phillips have gone forward to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is absent from the house on official business. I understand from the inquiries I have made that the documentation is being prepared and will be made public and will be furnished to this chamber in due course.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to questions asked by Senator Roblin and Senator Guay on February 7 concerning the make-up and role of the consultative group on the Garrison project.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Since neither senator is here this afternoon, perhaps the acting leader should postpone giving his answer until they return, in case they have some further questions.

Senator Frith: I can do that, but by putting the answer on the record now they will have an opportunity to review the subject and ask questions next week. Perhaps Senator Macdonald could inform Senator Roblin that I have put this answer on the record.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: I shall do that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the consultative group on the Garrison project is made up of senior officials from both the United States and Canadian governments. The Assistant Deputy Minister of the United States Branch, Department of External Affairs, and the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Canadian Affairs, Department of State, act as the joint chairmen. The Canadian members of the consultative group consist of officials of the Department of External Affairs, Environment Canada, including the western regional director and an official from the Canadian Wildlife Service, Fisheries and Oceans, the Canadian embassy in Washington; and officials from the Government of Manitoba. The American members of the consultative group consist of officials of the Department of State, the Department of the Interior, the official Wildlife Service, the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa, as well as officials from the Government of North Dakota.

Decisions made by the consultative group are indeed policy decisions, subject to ministerial approval. The date of the next meeting is April 25, in Washington, and was decided upon at the last meeting of the consultative group in November. It was thought that five months would give the technical committee enough time to meet three or four times and to proceed with its consultations. Of particular importance will be the report of the Biota task force on the McClusky fish screen.

SASKATCHEWAN

WATER SUPPLY TO REGINA AND MOOSE JAW

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on Tuesday last Senator Balfour asked a question about Petro-Canada and, in particular, about the space it was renting in Calgary. The honourable senator is not in the house at the moment. I was able to give him an answer to his question later in the day on Tuesday.

He also asked about the water supply to Regina and Moose Jaw. I found that that question had been answered, as reported at page 6233 of Debates of the Senate of November 28, 1983. Senator Balfour may wish to have a look at that answer and see if he has any supplementary questions arising from it.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (LOUIS PHILIPPE NADEAU AND MARIE THÉRÈSE BRULÉ)—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-3, intituled: "An Act to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Louis Philippe Nadeau and Marie Thérèse Rita Brulé".—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the sponsor of this bill for waiting until I was back in the Senate so I would have a chance to express my views on the bills before this chamber.

Meanwhile, I was trying to convince Quebecers that the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform had submitted an important paper and that they should take the time to study it. That is why I was absent from the Senate last week.

My desire to speak to these bills does not mean that I want to introduce a note of gloom in the proceedings. I would not want to prevent the union of two people, of two hearts. That is not the purpose of my intervention. Nor do I have any personal scruples. However, I am concerned about the consequences adopting these bills will have for public morality. I am even more concerned about the fact that these exceptions to the general law create legal fictions that have to be corrected if we get a flood of such cases before Parliament.

I read with interest the carefully prepared speech of my colleague, Senator Leblanc. He recalled the provisions of the general law, namely, the constitutional provisions concerning marriage and prohibited degrees. He also referred to the exclusive jurisdictions of the provinces, especially the Province of Quebec, with respect to the celebration of marriage. Senator Leblanc was right in saying that parliamentarians must protect the Constitution and the provisions of laws of general application passed by Parliament.

Honourable senators, when Senator Perrault was Leader of the Government in the Senate, we passed a number of such bills in 1975. There were further, similar cases in 1978. At the time we asked the Senate to decide on these cases, and we raised some legal issues. We asked Senator Perrault whether, if there were to be a marked increase in such cases before the Senate, the government would be prepared to amend the general law so that we could meet the criteria indicated in the marriage law exemptions of 1975 and 1978. Nothing more was heard about it, since no similar applications or petitions have been submitted to this chamber since then.

Today, Senator Leblanc is merely the instrument for introducing these petitions and moving first and second reading. He told us that the Senate would shortly be advised of ten more petitions dealing with the same subject. My colleague, Senator Leblanc, was backed by our Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. du Plessis, who explained in a letter that these petitions would be presented and that we would have a repeat before the Senate of requests for marriage law exemptions.

There is, of course, an impact on public morality and on the future of certain sectors of society, if we pass these bills quickly and give people who wish to submit petitions and prepare applications a chance to find out what their rights are beforehand. Although they should be able to know what criteria are applied, there are none for these exemptions. There are criteria for the general legislation we pass in Parliament, but there is none for these cases. The petitioners who ask us to pass bills to exempt them from the general law have no criteria to fall back on. The law does not dictate the criteria for making such applications. It does not mention them at all and, in any case, prohibits this kind of marriage or union.

We must consider the moral, legal and medical implications. In fact, there is no medical aspect involved in the first case: the uncle and niece applying for the exemption are 85 and 63 years old. There is very little likelihood of their having any progeny. However, if we look at the following bills, for instance, Bill S-2, the uncle is 50 years old and the niece is 33.

Honourable senators, I refer you to S-3, S-4 and S-5, and my comments today will also apply to those bills. I will not repeat my remarks which generally apply to these bills as well. With respect to the uncle and the niece, respectively aged 50 and 33, there are serious questions to be answered. We will have to obtain medical evidence that those people will not have child-bearing problems. They might also create problems for others by giving birth to handicapped children. Consanguinity links do exist and we must emphasize that there is a possibility that disabled, retarded or otherwise abnormal children might be born. Perhaps we might not delve unduly into the case where the uncle is 46 and the niece 48, but there is another rather important one related to Bill S-5. The uncle and the niece are 25 and 31 years old respectively. I am not prepared to tell those people that we will make an exception to the general law and let them get married without first hearing from a medical expert who will state unequivocally that there will be no medical, social or family complications. We must not think only about the people who bear children. We must remember that some day perhaps those children will get married and that might produce a generation of handicapped human beings. All I am saying is that, from a medical and family standpoint, we would be well advised to proceed with caution and avoid routinely stamping such special laws without raising some questions.

In 1975 and 1978, as I was saying—and Senator Frith referred to this in his remarks—the government was supposed to decide whether it would amend the general law to provide for those exceptional cases. That was a number of years ago and we are still waiting. The legal reservations or hypothetical doubt I have expressed have been heard in our universities. In committee not long ago, Senator Neiman passed around the well known McGill University law journal which featured an article by lawyer Albert Hubbard who raised several questions on the legal implications of those exceptions to the general law concerning marriage. That important article was headlined as follows:

● (1450)

[English]

Marriage Prohibitions, Adoption and Private Acts of Parliament: The Need for Reform

[Translation]

As for the exception to these bills which we are asked to approve, the author points out that it is time for Parliament to take up its responsibilities and review the legislation because of the ever increasing frequency of these incidents. I believe that we are only beginning to receive such bills to provide exception to our laws. We shall have a whole pile of them within a few years. People will ask us to make exceptions to the general legislation on marriage, especially because of the social implications honourable senators are aware of.

Shall we reinstate the forum which existed in the past when the powers of the Senate enabled us to pass divorce bills? I was a young Member of Parliament in those days; since we were Catholics, when divorce bills came to the other place, we were told: "You Catholics are not entitled to vote; you have to leave." We used to withdraw behind the curtains; we were prevented from voting and from doing our duty. We were told: "Do not confuse those people who have asked for a divorce; this was approved by the Senate." Mr. Peters, a member of the New Democratic Party, used to introduce these bills in the other place. Each and every Friday, at 5 o'clock, we would withdraw behind the curtains because we wanted to be good Catholics and did not wish to take the responsibility of voting on divorce bills.

That was the attitude at the time. If we let these requests accumulate without intending to amend the legislation, will the Senate not be forced to vote more often than necessary on these special measures related to our marriage laws?

With your leave and your indulgence, I would like to read a paragraph on this question from the comments made by Mr. Hubbard, a distinguished law professor at the University of Ottawa.

He said:

[English]

The granting of private exemptions from public law would seem to be inherently dangerous in that it is arbitrary and may undermine respect for the law. However, the making of exceptions for persons whose circumstances reveal nothing to distinguish their cases from those of any similarly related couple in Canada is totally inconsistent with any semblance of social purpose in the general law on the prohibited degrees of marriage. The only apparent point of concern in Parliament's deliberation on these bills was eugenics. Assurance was sought that any children that might be born would be unaffected by the consanguinity of their parents. Of course, this limited concern overlooks the fact that the general law does not prohibit an uncle and niece from having children. It merely prohibits them from having legitimate children. More importantly, since the medical opinion on the point is based primarily on the degree of relationship rather than on any physical attributes peculiar to the parties, the risk is virtually the same for all similarly related couples; such risk can hardly be used as a criterion for treating some cases differently from the rest. It would appear, then, that the only justification for private legislation is the perception that the general law prohibiting marriages within the degrees in question is no longer socially acceptable and ought to be changed. In fact, the debate on the various bills reveals that this was the prevailing sentiment, as the following exchange indicates:—

[Translation]

At this point, the author quotes the views expressed in 1975 and 1978 by Senators Flynn and Perrault, and perhaps as well by Senator Frith and myself, on the possibility of changing the general law.

And he goes on:

[English]

When, some two-and-a-half years later, three more private bills came before the Senate, the same misgivings were voiced, and Senator Perrault removed tongue from cheek in order to say the following:

[Translation]

In 1978, when three bills came before us, Senator Perrault promised he would ask the Government for amendments to the public general law. He was surprised at the introduction of these three petitions for marriage law exemptions, and remembered our representations. Senator Perrault made a long statement, which Professor Hubbard referred to as an example, to explain the government did not have the time to look into the matter. We once more had to pass a special law, in the interest of the parties involved.

Honourable senators, legislative work deals mainly with matters of general public interest which, as opposed to special laws, apply to everybody. When these special laws become so numerous, legislators in their wisdom amend the general act to include those exemptions, in order to accommodate a significant part of the people requesting those amendments.

But this is not the case now. There are four cases now before us, and we may expect perhaps ten or so in the near future. The fact remains it is becoming embarrassing for us to put aside the general act and pass those special laws.

Mr. Hubbard concludes his article as follows:

[English]

It will next be seen that the uncertainties of our law in the area of prohibited degrees are increased greatly by the impact of provincial adoption laws.

[Translation]

With the new provincial adoption laws, the numbers will increase, we will have them every week.

[English]

Having regard to the anomaly-infested state of this law and to the highly questionable practice of enacting private exemptions, it is clearly time for the long-awaited reform.

[Translation]

My goal in rising today is to call the Senate's attention to that legal fiction, which is most important in my lawyer's mind. Before we proceeded, it was implied to me that a motion could be put by my colleague to refer to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs the whole matter of the public general act and special laws concerning marriage.

I am agreeable to that. However, I suggest this is something we should have done in 1975 and 1978. Are your cases, Senator Leblanc, so urgent that they cannot wait for the results of that study on such possible amendments to the general act by the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs?

Hon. Azellus Denis: One of them is 85 years old.

Senator Asselin: I am not the mover of the bill. Perhaps Senator Leblanc was given confidential information but he is not bound to tell me. First of all, should we not undertake a thorough consideration of possible amendments to the legislation? The amendment to the general law would be redrafted with the consent of the Acting Leader of the Government. We could proceed immediately in the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs where we would immediately consider possible changes and ask the Minister of Justice to introduce during this session the necessary amendments to clarify the situation.

But, as I said, if there is some urgency to the matter, I am not going to launch a campaign to prevent the marriage of two people in love. I am not going to stop it tomorrow morning by any means. Senator Charbonneau is smiling but he was not here a moment ago when I referred to the age of some of those people. Perhaps if you had been here you would be more cautious about the possibilities of intervention.

Such was my view in 1975; I tried to explain it today, Mr. Speaker, since there is apparently a certain number of exemptions requested in that respect.

It is our duty as legislators to see that the general law is enforced. If it cannot be enforced in certain cases, the law should simply be amended.

Hon. Jean Le Moyne: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Asselin. Would there be some guidance in the new canon law? Is it still relevant under the circumstances?

● (1510)

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I will quote if I may part of an article by a lawyer, Mr. Hubbard, on that important issue. He specifically refers to canon law. To enlighten the senator who has perhaps some canonical rather than legal concerns about those exceptions, I will let him have the article, he could read it and would easily understand.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: If Senator Leblanc speaks now, he will close the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill S-3.

Senator Leblanc: If no other senator wishes to take part in this debate, honourable senators, I should like first of all to congratulate Senator Asselin for his remarks on the four bills which are before us.

I do not object to the whole matter being thoroughly considered by the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I think that all age related problems could be cleared out; otherwise, they could be addressed when we have to vote on the four bills.

As indicated by Senator Asselin, I am willing to move a general motion calling for the subject-matter to be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I think, however, that the petitioners based their request on private exemptions enacted in 1975 and 1978. As I mentioned when I first spoke on this subject, I do not think it would be appropriate to discriminate against these people. I think, however, that the sooner we move a general motion calling for this problem to be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the better it would be, because, such being the case, Canadians requesting private exemptions would then be aware that the matter is under consideration. However Canadians are aware that private exemptions enacted by Parliament have received Royal Assent in 1975 and 1978. For these reasons, I do not think it advisable to discriminate against these people, unless the evidence submitted to the committee is contrary to the instructions which committee members may issue.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move that Bill S-3 be read the second time. I intend to move later that this bill be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Asselin: Before this motion is adopted, honourable senators, am I to understand that Senator Leblanc will move a motion to have the subject-matter of this legislation referred to a committee? Will he move this motion today? Was there not a motion? The other day, Senator Leblanc showed me a motion. Is Senator Frith aware of this motion?

Senator Frith: When the mover of this bill rose the other day, honourable senators, he said that he would co-operate in respect of this motion. It is our wish, through this motion, to refer this issue to the committee; it is clear that we share this view. I should prefer to have a motion in writing.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I understand that this motion is already in writing.

Senator Frith: In that case, I suggest that we adopt Bills S-2, S-4 and S-5 immediately after this bill and then that a motion be moved to the effect that the committee must consider not only the bills in question but also the principle raised by the Honourable Senator Asselin as well as by other senators.

Senator Asselin: In that case, I agree that these bills be passed on second reading, provided that the general motion be also moved.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Austin P.C.).

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne. As always, we live in a time of crisis. Ours is an age of rapid and sometimes destabilizing change. The Speech from the Throne has addressed itself to our circumstances and has set forth two goals central to the well-being of Canadians.

The first of these goals is to secure world peace. Canadians have had the opportunity to hear a debate in the other place earlier today on the subject of world peace. The Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau spoke eloquently about the significance of peace to Canadians and about the role and responsibility of Canadians to communicate our desire for world peace and our desire to see a political will for world peace in the international community and, most significantly, in the minds and policies of the super powers. This is a subject that will remain foremost among the concerns of Canadians in the months and years ahead. Our political leadership must remain vigilant and active in order to pursue the mission of peace which the Prime Minister has initiated.

Our second goal is to secure the prosperity of individual Canadians.

In setting out these goals, the Throne Speech makes us focus on the difficult and challenging path ahead.

Today I am taking the opportunity offered by this debate to address some key questions concerning Canada's future. In particular, these are, first, the critical challenges facing our country in the years ahead in our economic environment; secondly, the role of social policy in meeting these challenges; and thirdly, the principal elements of the social agenda for the 1980s.

We are all aware of the major challenges that Canada faces in dealing with rapid technological change, fierce international competition and major industrial restructuring. It is now commonplace to say that we have crossed the threshold into a new industrial era. To prosper in our economic environment, we must, as a nation, find ways of becoming more productive. Our mines, factories and service industries must become more efficient. As individuals, we must become more highly flexible and skilled. We must re-examine our political and economic institutions in order to ensure that they can manage both fairly and efficiently the difficult choices and transitions ahead. None of these challenges will be met easily.

I share the hope and expectation that the Macdonald commission, which is made up of Canadians with both a deep and broad experience in the many walks of Canadian life, will present us with useful advice to help Canada along its way. However large the challenges and however urgent the tasks, these problems are not new nor will they be for succeeding generations. Many of the same forces that preoccupy us today have been critical in the development and management of every western industrialized economy for decades.

The plain fact is that historically Canadians have a remarkable record for finding successful solutions to the pressures of economic and social change. Too often we take this proud record for granted. From the Grand National Policy, to the Auto Pact, through to our current efforts to explore the potential of the Pacific Rim, we have found solutions to the challenge of achieving economic diversification and development while sited beside the largest economy and strongest political entity in the western world.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate Senator Pitfield on what I consider to be an outstanding contribution to the debate on Canada-U.S. relations, which he made in an address to the Canadian Club of Toronto earlier this month.

At critical occasions in our history, we have undertaken massive resource development projects and built new and more efficient systems of transportation and communication. In so doing, we have responded to economic and technological changes in ways which assured our ability to continue to profit from rich national endowments and to overcome the barriers of geography.

The construction of a trans-Canada pipeline and our current efforts to modernize and upgrade our national system of railways are just two examples of our efforts in these areas.

Every Prime Minister, from Sir John A. Macdonald to Mackenzie King, to Pierre Elliott Trudeau, has had to deal with the problems raised by our geography. This Parliament saw a most recent example during the Crow debate last fall.

Social values have changed. We have moved permanently away from the Darwinian attitudes of the nineteenth century. We have been able to put in place an innovative network of social programs. Medicare, unemployment insurance, and the Canada Pension Plan are only three notable examples. These social safety nets have proven their capacity to provide security and to fulfil the changing needs of individuals in a market society. The vivid experience of many Canadians in the last two years has given solid proof of the worth of our social security safety net system.

Finally, even though the turbulence of the seventies brought more bad news than good, we should not lose sight of the fact that, throughout those years of rapid and unanticipated change, our economy was resilient enough to create new jobs at a rate that far outstripped the performance of any other western industrialized nation. The economic standing of Canadians as a whole has increased remarkably in real terms in the last 15 years.

This is not to say that our past accomplishments have been achieved effortlessly. The world does not owe us a living—not Europe, not Japan, or the United States, and particularly not the Third World countries, which are only starting their development. Let us constantly remind ourselves that there is no cause for complacency and no reason to assume blithely that the future will take care of itself. Many of the challenges ahead will have new, unusual and complex dimensions. They will have unique elements that will test us.

At the same time, we must never allow ourselves to become so daunted by the complexities we face that we lapse into an exaggerated belief that the challenges themselves are utterly unprecedented and require entirely new solutions. We know, if we are calm, that such a belief is rarely true.

Those who become daunted are condemned to repeat errors and to fall behind in the competitive world. In particular, there are some who hold the belief that, in times of cyclical downward economic activity, we must jettison or at least drastically reduce the established system of safety nets and other government social programming which those same skeptics deem to be a drag on our economic efficiency and a barrier to effective competition in an increasingly unforgiving international marketplace.

I categorically reject this view. The reality is that our enviable record of post-war prosperity was, in fact, founded on the synthesis of economic growth and social development. Through efforts to provide full employment, to keep the disadvantaged from the depths of poverty and its ills, to broaden access to education, and to build a healthy society, government has strengthened the social fabric and, at the same time, promoted the levels of spending required to stabilize the economy and to trigger investment and growth.

What has been true in this past experience remains true today. Indeed, more than ever before, economic and social policy must be mutually reinforcing. In a world of technological change, of economic uncertainty and of broad public awareness of the distribution of the costs and benefits of change, social development remains a requirement for successful economic development.

Before proceeding to my major theme, let me make one further point. Some miscreants continue to persist in the myth that social spending is out of control. This myth is commonly held, but it is entirely without foundation. On a national basis, since the mid-seventies, social spending has been effectively stable, both as a percentage of gross national product and as a percentage of total government expenditures. If any criticism is to be levelled, in my view the criticism is that we have not invested more of our resources in the social development field. While the volume of resources allocated to the social sector will continue to make the fiscal issue an important one, to allow it to preoccupy the debate on the future of social policy and to obscure the capacity of the sector to help meet the challenges ahead is simply to proclaim the merits of blindness.

Now I want to turn to the role of social policy and to our objectives of fairness, security and growth. Many of our social programs are designed to ensure that all Canadians have the resources they need to purchase the goods and services that give meaning to the terms, "standard of living" and "consumer choice." Through medicare, the old age security system, the Canada Assistance Plan and a variety of other programs, individuals are provided with income and access to essential services so as to broaden the range of individual choice and thereby facilitate the pursuit of individual values.

As I have said, there are those who believe that government expenditures on these social programs somehow compromise our capacity to invest in adequate volume, and, while I will never be in the ranks of those who question the importance of investment, having spent a good part of my personal life in that field, I am aware that concerns regarding the impact of social spending on our ability to invest are often misplaced and usually exaggerated. There are two principal reasons. First, large volumes of investment are not the prescription for the problems of the future. Sheer quantity of investment is not the issue. The issue is the quality of the investment and our ability to apply it to a successful targeting of our competitive advantage.

Second, we should remember that consumption-oriented social programs are intended not to raise overall levels of consumption in the economy but to ensure a fairer distribution of the capacity to consume between individuals. As a means of achieving a redistribution rather than an expansion of consumption, the impact of these programs on our investment potential seems more apparent than real. While many would support efforts to find more efficient means of providing assistance and fair access to goods and services, to advocate wholesale reductions in these programs is simply to sanction consumption by the advantaged over consumption by the disadvantaged.

Take the case of medicare. When we introduced medicare in 1966, we did not reduce the proportion of the national income available for investment. What medicare did was channel private consumption through government and, in so doing, provide the guarantee to all Canadians of universal access to hospital services on uniform terms and conditions regardless of age, income or region.

Those who argue that we can no longer afford medicare as it currently exists do not advocate fewer doctors or a dismantling of hospitals; rather, they would appear to be satisfied with a simple shift back to the private sector. This view may reflect ideology, but it does not reflect economic reality. Such a change would not diminish the quantity of resources consumed in health care; in fact, the Economic Council of Canada's most recent annual review has given us reason to believe that a private system would be less efficient. Medicare did not expand consumption to the detriment of investment. On the contrary, it guaranteed fairer access at lower cost. The preservation of a universally accessible national system of prepaid medical care, one of the government's highest legislative priorities in the current session, means the preservation of a system which has proven itself to be both socially equitable and economically efficient.

In addition to providing Canadians with access to a reasonable level of services and income, social policy has an important role to play in supporting the operation of the market economy and facilitating the inevitable adjustments our economy must undergo, if we are to survive in the tough international environment of the '80s.

Precisely because the market remains society's most effective institution for the management of economic development, government has an obligation to take actions which can lessen threats to the ability of the market to do its work. High among these is the need to provide individuals who may be threatened by change, and who therefore resist it, with a clear sense of security and a clear sense of fair treatment. By providing income and equitable access to services, the social sector helps to ensure both. In so doing, social programs help to alleviate the perceived costs and uncertainties of change and thereby promote its acceptance. In essence, these programs attempt to provide the individual with a more secure, less uncertain environment, thus enabling him or her to accept more readily the need for change.

By helping to avoid a debilitating rush to protect the present, social programs foster a climate supportive of investment and real change. Seen in this light, the many adjustments ahead seem to argue for expansion rather than reduction in the range of these programs. They provide security for change, not from change. As outlined in the Speech from the Throne, my own government's commitment to pension reform and the provision of employment opportunities must be seen within the context of the need to provide an atmosphere of individual security and well-being sufficient to induce Canadians, in a changing and turbulent world, to embrace change rather than reject it.

While a social climate supportive of economic change requires security and fairness, perhaps even more important is the need for a clear sense of opportunity and hope. This sense holds out for each individual the prospect of a future capable of providing meaningful roles and genuine prosperity. It creates a willingness to look forward. As security lowers the perceived costs of change, opportunity enhances the perception of its benefits.

Providing opportunity is nothing more than extending to each Canadian the chance to invest in himself. Promoting this chance—in our society perhaps it should be called this right—to self-development is a fundamental objective of the social sector.

Social investment programs pursue the objective of self-development by creating opportunities to acquire new capacities and by acting to reduce the barriers confronted by some Canadians in applying their skills and participating fully in the larger community. Clearly, education and training programs are at the core of this element of the social sector. Beyond this, social investment programs span the range from measures to promote opportunities for women to efforts to ensure the full participation and sharing of native peoples in the opportunities of our society. All of these programs represent the means by which individuals can acquire the tools necessary to express and pursue their personal development.

The Speech from the Throne presented a broad array of measures aimed at equipping our citizens with the means to pursue personal fulfillment within a changing economy; for example: the announcement of a $1 billion Youth Opportunity Fund; the appointment of a Minister of State for Youth; and the creation of a National Volunteer Service and Conservation Corps.

While of great intrinsic social importance, providing accessible opportunities for individuals to enhance their capacities and skills is also critical to our ability as a nation to compete successfully in the world economy. There is general agreement that, in the 1980s and beyond, the frontier of competition will be knowledge-based and decisions on human capital development will define a nation's competitive strategy.

Meeting this competitive challenge will be nowhere more important than in Canada's relatively small and open economy. Major world-wide innovations in transportation and communications technology have greatly enhanced the international mobility of capital. Facing fierce competition, multinational corporations have increasingly strong incentives to locate low-skill, labour intensive production processes in newly industrializing nations with significantly lower wage rates.

As a result, the future prosperity of all industrialized nations, embedded as they are in this increasingly complex international division of labour, depends on a successful concentration on skill-intensive products, processes and services.

With their dependence on skilled labour, these production processes must remain wherever the necessary skilled labour can be found.

If Canada is to compete successfully with other developed nations for the investment that will provide jobs and sustain growth, it must have a skilled and flexible labour force able to adjust to the shifting demands of technological change. Federally supported training programs and the cost-shared post-secondary sector must face and meet these challenges. Social development through investment in people, now more than ever before, is a basic prerequisite to economic prosperity.

Let me turn now to Social Citizenship and An Agenda for the Years Ahead.

The concept of social citizenship is founded on the belief that, where each individual takes responsibility for his or her own well-being, their collective action is an effective mechanism for enhancing and enriching the capacity of individuals to express and pursue their personal values. It is a concept that recognizes that the challenges of economic change and social development will be met by individuals acting both separately and co-operatively. At the core, social citizenship must mean a commitment to guarantee Canadians fair access to services and to provide them with genuine opportunities to expand and fully utilize their capacities.

As the '80s unfold, one of the central challenges we face will be to elaborate, diversify and strengthen the programs that provide Canadians with a sense of security, fair treatment and opportunity for individual and collective development. In this context, the principal elements of the social agenda for the years ahead will include, first, the development of human resources. The need for skilled labour is clear. We must ensure that Canadians possess not only skills but flexible skills. Special efforts will be required to address the problems of displaced older workers, unemployed young Canadians, native peoples, and women, who are represented disproportionately in occupations threatened by technological displacement. In addition, we must explore ways of harnessing to the task of skill development the interests and capacities of the private sector.

The second principal element of the social agenda is employment and income security. There is a need to forge links between these critical areas of social policy. Industrial restructuring means changing labour requirements. There will be an accompanying need for mechanisms and programs to facilitate and support the transition from one job to the next. In an economy in which productivity gains are likely to be concentrated in capital intensive sectors, there may be a need to explore mechanisms for sharing the benefits of those productivity gains equitably throughout society. All of these factors point to the need to assess carefully the adequacy and efficiency of the current network of income security programs and, in that context, to consider whether significant social and economic advances can be made by moving toward a more comprehensive approach.

In the related area of pensions, we must ensure that our systems—both public and private—are able to meet the demands that will be imposed by an aging society. In addition, in order to promote national unity and to facilitate industrial restructuring, it will be important to eliminate pension-based barriers to the mobility of individuals.

The third item on the agenda relates to native peoples. Simple fairness demands that we ensure the full sharing by native peoples in the economic development of the nation. To do so will require continued efforts to build a political framework capable of providing aboriginal peoples with a genuine opportunity for self-determination. As outlined in the Speech from the Throne, successful pursuit of the current constitutional discussions on native rights will be an essential ingredient in meeting this challenge. Equally important will be the government's commitment to the equitable settlement of native land claims.

Honourable senators, there are large challenges ahead. Over the course of the past 30 years we have developed approaches to public policy that foster social development and at the same time promote economic growth and development. Undoubtedly, the challenges that now confront us have new elements to them and will require our creative effort to apply our experience to the old task of securing prosperity in an increasingly technological and competitive world.

Vital to our success will be a commitment to provide both security and fairness in this changing world and to provide hope and genuine opportunities to individual Canadians for their future. If we enhance our social citizenship, we will ease the process of change and provide this nation with the skilled, flexible labour force that is now an absolute prerequisite to our economic growth. Social citizenship must be the basis upon which we build the national effort to secure our future. It is the key challenge which the government must and will address.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 14, 1984, at 2 p.m.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

ALBERTA LEGISLATURE SPECIAL SELECT COMMITTEE ON
SENATE REFORM

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, visiting us today and seated in the south gallery are members of the Special Select Committee of the Legislature of Alberta on Senate Reform. I should like to introduce to you Mr. Dennis Anderson, Chairman, Mrs. Sheila Embury, Vice-Chairman, Mr. Harry Alger, M.L.A., Dr. David Carter, M.L.A., Mr. Ronald Moore, M.L.A. and Mr. Nigelian Pen-gelly, M.L.A.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE LATE HON. ALLISTER GROSART, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, the family of the late Allister Grosart have asked me to extend their thanks to the delegation from this chamber who attended his funeral.

I would like to associate myself with the splendid tributes paid in this chamber last Thursday to the Honourable Allister Grosart, Privy Councillor, former senator and sometime Speaker of this house. He and I were great friends for more than a quarter of a century. We were associates in business for more than 20 years as directors of the First City Trust. He was a man of depth. Not too many people knew that he was a lover of literature and a student of Shakespeare. He was fond of good talk, good books and he was an art collector of considerable renown. He was the owner of a large number of paintings which he had collected over a period of many years.

When he came to the Senate, he undertook the most arduous task of studying science policy. When the chairman of the special Senate committee became ill, he carried the burden and, for the first time, brought an awareness to the country of what was involved.

He was a partisan only in the sense that he argued his point of view. He never aimed to destroy the other point of view. According to Senator Grosart, the best way was to sit down and reason.

He was a kindly and modest man, imbued with the spirit of Parliament. He understood this chamber and made a distinguished mark for himself as Speaker. He was a careful and responsible legislator with a high standard of conduct. Many people pass through this chamber. Some leave a mark and some leave memories. He did both.

Senator Grosart was active in the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group and the Canada-Europe Inter-Parliamentary Group.

His principal interest was the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. He was vice-chairman and then chairman of the Canadian delegation, a position he held for 15 years. He also served on the International Executive of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association for more than four years. He was very active, and made an outstanding contribution in terms of revising their constitution, something he loved to do.

He had one rule when speaking abroad as a representative of Canada, and he spoke often—he never saw the warts.

He was a credit to this chamber, always an activist, a good Canadian, a good senator, and a good friend. I shall remember him as a good friend.

Some men meet standards; others set them. He was one of the "others".

I extend to his wife, Thelma, and to his daughters, Geraldene, Victoria and Jane Galbraith, my sincerest condolences and my memories of a life well spent.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

SASKATCHEWAN—SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Honourable Senator Argue, Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, with respect to the Special Employment Initiatives Program. I assume that he is familiar with that policy. My question is: Does he consult other Liberal senators from Saskatchewan when dealing with the dispensation of patronage under this program?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Dispensation of what?

Senator Roblin: Patronage.

Senator Argue: Any suggestion that the Special Employment Initiatives Program is a tool of patronage is very improper and very inaccurate. I have the responsibility in the cabinet, as the regional minister for Saskatchewan, to make recommendations to the government on a wide range of programs and policies that affect Saskatchewan. I have had the privilege of making recommendations on many projects relating to public works, and regarding any of these recommendations that may be coming forward I certainly welcome the views of honourable senators from Saskatchewan—or the views of my colleagues in the chamber on either side of the house. I hope that whatever recommendations I make from time to time are in the public interest and the interest of Saskatchewan.

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: I share the sentiment expressed by the minister in his last sentence. I, too, hope that they improve things in Saskatchewan. So far as my honourable friend is concerned, they will have to improve them considerably before he needs to worry about it in terms of the House of Commons. It seems obvious from his reply to my question that he has not as yet consulted with any of his Senate colleagues from

[Senator Sparrow.]

Saskatchewan. In order to give him the credit that is his due as a dispenser—he does not like the word “patronage,” but as the man who is managing or advising on the expenditures under the Special Employment Initiatives Program—

An Hon. Senator: Slush fund!

Senator Roblin: Did I hear the words “slush fund?”

An Hon. Senator: Slush fund.

Senator Roblin: I would never dream of using that phrase. If he cannot stand the word “patronage,” what would he do with the words “slush fund?” Perhaps he would go through the ceiling.

I should like the minister, if he is willing, to share with this chamber the information as to the allocation of funds that have been paid in the province of Saskatchewan under his auspices, and I should like to know their purpose.

Senator Argue: I do not have all of that information with me. I have made recommendations from time to time that have been acted upon. One particular recommendation relating to bringing forward works' programs under the budget resulted in an additional $6 million for the Regina airport. I have made recommendations that have resulted in a provision of $5.7 million for Agrabition in Regina. I have made recommendations, with the approval of the appropriate minister or ministers, that have resulted in a provision of $6 million for a bio-tech industry in Saskatoon. I recall that provision has been made for $300,000 for the Humboldt airport.

When one talks about a slush fund when referring to Saskatchewan, I do not suppose it is possible for a minister from that province to make a recommendation that would result in a public works project proceeding in the riding of a Liberal member. Therefore, I do not understand how these words “slush fund” come in. When recommendations for projects such as the one for the Regina airport, or the allocation of $10 million for the proteins oil and starch plant in Saskatoon, or the project for the Humboldt airport, or the Persephone Theatre in Saskatoon, or a hostel for battered wives, or whatever, are received by the appropriate minister, if he agrees to them and if they meet the requirements of the civil service as well as the rules that are applied to these projects, then there is every possibility that they will go forward. But in no way are they a slush fund for anybody.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, a short while ago the government published a list of certain public activities that called for the expenditure of funds for the Province of Quebec. It was a very detailed list that gave all the information under certain programs. I am asking my honourable friend to do the same thing for the Province of Saskatchewan with respect to the Special Employment Initiatives Program. Will he undertake to provide that information?

Senator Argue: I will undertake to discuss this with my colleagues. I do not have a list for all the particular programs for Saskatchewan. Senator Roblin will understand that these and other programs are discussed among various government departments, but I will make those inquiries based on his question.

Senator Roblin: I want to tell my friend that the instruction to Liberal members of Parliament successful enough to have projects of this kind is to make a public announcement of the project together with the minister's name—that is, the Honourable John Roberts or the Honourable Marc Lalonde or perhaps even the Prime Minister for all I know. Why does the minister not at least give us those announcements so we can see what is going on in the province of Saskatchewan?

Senator Argue: I can tell the Honourable Senator Roblin that I have no information with regard to the statement he has read about Liberal members from the province of Quebec and how announcements may or may not be made in that province. I just do not have any information on that subject.

Senator Roblin: I would refer to Mrs. Ursula Appolloni as one source of this information. With the resources available to the minister and his department, I should think he would find it quite simple to give me the information I want. I would simply ask for an assurance that he will do so.

Senator Argue: I repeat that I will take note of the request of the honourable senator. I will discuss the question with my colleagues and bring Senator Roblin an answer in due course.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Only Liberal members in Saskatchewan would make the announcement.

Senator Roblin: When we have an opportunity to elect senators from Saskatchewan, I will expect my honourable friend to throw his hat in the ring. He may even be elected because I think he is a pretty good fellow. I am not sure that all the senators elected from Saskatchewan would be Liberals, but we can afford to slip one in; that would do no great harm. I welcome my friend in that capacity.

TRANSPORTATION

SENIOR GRAIN TRANSPORTATION COMMITTEE—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board concerning the Senior Grain Transportation Committee, which is a new body set up under the revision of the Crowsnest arrangement.

A backgrounder published by the department in reference to this committee attempts to describe what it does. I am seeking to find out from the minister what this committee's authority really is. The handout says that this board will be virtually free to handle any issue in the grain industry. What does "handle" mean? Is this a question of policy? Is it an advisory committee or is it an executive committee? In other words, is the Senior Grain Transportation Committee going to study problems referred to it or will it undertake studies on its own initiative and advise the Honourable Mr. Jack Horner of the Grain Transportation Authority? What I am asking is: Is this body advisory or is it executive?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): My understanding is that it is an advisory group to the administrator and is constituted under the new act. It is a body consisting of around 24 persons. I have not had brought to my attention the particular paper from which the honourable senator is reading.

Senator Roblin: I have seen the names of the members of that committee and I think we can repose a good deal of confidence in their common sense. In any event, the minister is really telling me that, so far as the government is concerned, "handle" means advise.

Senator Argue: I shall have to check to see how much authority that advisory committee has. I have been interested in the question of whether any authority extends to the operation of the block system that has been handled by the Canadian Wheat Board. I am advised by the Canadian Wheat Board that the board itself retains authority for the allocation of cars within the block shipping system. The board believes that that kind of continuing authority is very valuable, and I agree. They say that authority remains intact under this legislation.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has confused me even more, because he now seems to have said that there may be some executive capacity in this committee. I hope he will be able to bring in a clear definition of the responsibilities and the real influence that committee will have on the conduct of the grain transportation system.

Senator Argue: I will bring that in to the honourable senator.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

1982-83 BARLEY PRICES

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Would he care to explain how the board came to so grossly over-estimate barley prices for 1982-83 that the taxpayers will now have to kick in $5.5 million to recoup the board's deficit?

● (1420)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I regret, with great respect, the way in which that question is phrased. I do not think that the board made a gross miscalculation.

When, on behalf of the government, I announce the initial prices for grain for the coming year, there is a certain element of risk involved in terms of the government's guaranteeing those prices. However, the producers feel—and I agree with them—that that process is an extremely important part of our grain marketing system. In the best judgment of both the board and the government, it is believed that the initial prices established are a reasonable reflection of what is to come.

In the particular year to which Senator Bielish referred, there was an unforeseen glut of feed grains on the world market, and prices went down. Because prices dropped far more than any forecast had indicated they might, there was a loss in the amount that Senator Bielish mentioned, namely, $5.5 million. However, when that loss is related to the total value of all of the grains handled by the Canadian Wheat Board—some $5.4 billion, then that projection of the Canadian Wheat Board, in guaranteeing prices to producers and thereby making a contribution on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada amounting to $5.5 million, constitutes, in my view, the best estimate one could expect when dealing in these almost astronomical figures. I say that this small charge to the government, in relation to the value of this tremendous enterprise, demonstrates the sound judgment of the Canadian Wheat Board. I have a great deal of faith in taking forward the board's recommendations on initial grain prices.

Honourable senators, I think this question was based on an article written up in the Globe and Mail. With great respect to the writer of that article, I think he was a bit off base. But the main point of that announcement is that in the final payment the producers of western Canada received $409 million, and were well satisfied to do so. I spoke to members of both the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture and the Palliser Wheat Growers—organizations that are well respected, although they are on different sides of the philosophical fence. I heard not a single objection to the announcement that was made, nor did I hear any complaint about this charge to the taxpayers of Canada concerning an operation that has returned benefits a hundredfold to them.

Senator Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Is action being taken to ensure that this sort of overestimation is not made again?

Senator Argue: The answer to that question is no, and I say that with great feeling. The day on which the Conservative Party might announce that it will not risk a dollar of the taxpayers' money on the Canadian Wheat Board marketing system will be a very sad day, indeed, for the producers of western Canada, who have worked for generations to put into place a system that provides for a guaranteed initial price. I am proud to be able to say that the government has stood behind the Canadian Wheat Board and continues to do so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—SELF-GOVERNMENT

Hon. Philip Deane Gigantes: Honourable senators, on the radio this morning I heard a disturbing report that, in connection with talks that are now proceeding between representatives of the Inuit and Indian people and federal government officials, there is some resistance on the part of officials to the idea of providing increased self-government for our native people. In the past I have come into contact with such officials—I hope they were not representative—and I have been stunned by their insensitive paternalism. Their methods of overseeing and running the lives of Inuit and Indian people have been catastrophic. It may be argued that other factors have contributed to the misery in which many of our oldest compatriots among the Inuit and Indians now live, but since we have tried paternalism and tutelage, I believe it is time we gave them a much greater measure of the self-government they ask for and deserve. I would ask the Acting Leader of the Government to ascertain why federal government officials are trying to block this necessary development in our constitutional history.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in accordance with our practice, I shall not comment on the accuracy of the radio news story, and, of course, I am unable to comment on the honourable senator's personal experience with departmental officials. I cannot associate myself with his description of the program's administration, but I will undertake to ascertain from the responsible minister whether it is the department's policy to "block" movement toward self-government for the Inuit and Indian people.

Senator Gigantes: As a supplementary, successive ministers have shown great goodwill toward the Inuit and Indian people in this matter. However, there is a measure of built-in interest on the part of the Public Service that deals with such matters to let things remain as they are. Can the Acting Leader of the Government assure us that precautions are being taken to prevent such bias from distorting any necessary development?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am certain it is not government policy that public servants should take such policy decisions. I can only repeat my undertaking to ascertain the minister's policy on this matter. I am sure that our Public Service does everything it can to implement government policy rather than to block it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENTS

Honorable Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government.

It concerns the present situation regarding the renewal or signing of general development agreements. We are aware that agreements in effect since 1974 were to expire in ten years' time, in other words, at the end of March 1984.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): What kind of agreements?

Senator Tremblay: I am referring to general agreements for regional development. These agreements are due to expire at the end of March 1984. If I am not mistaken, two provinces have signed new agreements with the federal government—Manitoba and Saskatchewan, I believe.

My question is as follows: What is the situation for the other provinces as regards the signing of new regional development agreements, and what is happening to the negotiations or perhaps the lack of negotiations between the federal government and the government of Quebec in this respect?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I promise to try and get the information requested by Senator Tremblay as soon as possible.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

RESEARCH ON NEW GENETIC VARIETIES OF GRAINS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, will the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board bring us up to date on the research to develop new genetic varieties of grains?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I believe that the honourable senator is referring to the announcement that the Canadian Wheat Board is accepting contracts to develop a new genetic variety of bread wheat with the technical name HY320. This is a 3M wheat which is designed to be of medium quality and of much higher productivity. The Canadian Wheat Board believes that it must be very cautious in promoting the development of this kind of wheat. However, it feels that there is a place for such wheat. The wheats we are now producing are of the highest qualities found anywhere in the world and Canada has the best grading system in the world. Therefore, our wheat commands a premium price on the international markets, a position we want to protect.

At the same time, the Wheat Board recognizes that there is a market for lower quality wheat. In years when the weather is exceptionally good we do not have much low quality wheat. In years when the weather is not so good and there is a lot of dampness or frost, we have a larger range in quality, sometimes going as low as feed wheat. There is a great demand for producers to accept contracts to produce, for example, 50 acres of HY320, which is likely to out-yield the standard varieties by 25 to 30 per cent. But it will not command the premium price on the world market.

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I understand that Prime Minister Trudeau is meeting tomorrow afternoon with General Secretary Chernenko to talk about matters involving Canada and the Soviet Union. I also understand that there will be some discussion about the Prime Minister's peace initiative. Will this discussion end the Prime Minister's peace mission? If not, what is his next step?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I doubt that such a peace initiative is ever finished, so I doubt that I will be able to say that the meeting with the Soviet General Secretary will end the Prime Minister's mission. I believe that the Prime Minister will take whatever initiatives he is able to take to gain world peace, as long as he lives, so I find it difficult to seek the information. However, I shall see that the Prime Minister's Office is made aware of the question and, if it has some comments to make, I shall furnish them to the honourable senator and to the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I am sure the Prime Minister must have some kind of agenda. He has met the President of the United States, he is going to meet the President of the Soviet Union, and members of Parliament have a right to know what the Prime Minister has next on his agenda. Is he supposed to meet the President of the United States again to report on his talks with the President of the Soviet Union, Mr. Chernenko? Is he supposed to report again to Parliament on his mission in the Soviet Union?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, a supplementary question generally elaborates on the main question. I can only add that I will give the Senate the information if it is available.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information with reference to questions raised earlier.

First, on a question raised by Senator Roblin on February 7, 1984, about a matter of interest to him and Senator Guay concerning the make-up of the consultation group on the Garrison Diversion Project, I have a list of the members of the consultation group at the consultations on Garrison on November 21, 1983, in Ottawa. Honourable senators, I ask that the list be taken as read. I can tell honourable senators that all members are, apparently, ex officio, in the sense that they sit as holders of the various offices listed from time to time.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government):
 Honourable senators, with reference to a question asked by Senator Asselin on February 9, 1984, concerning a petition recommending the Prime Minister for the Nobel Peace Prize, any inquiries concerning those nominating a person for a Nobel Prize should be addressed to the Nobel Committee in lists confidential and it would be up to them to change their policy.

Hon. C. William Doody: Do you have the address?

Senator Frith: I undertake to try to obtain the address for honourable senators, on request.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government):
 Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie has not asked about this issue today, but the answer I have is really a follow-up with respect to a question asked by him and Senator Roblin on Lebanon. As of a day or so ago I had an answer, but I have now received a more up-to-date one.

Despite intermittent sniping and occasional fierce artillery
 barrages in Beirut—it sounds like a description of Question Period—and surrounding suburbs, no Canadians have yet been casualties of this latest outbreak of the civil war in Lebanon.
 However, a consular warning was published Monday, February 13, to be repeated on Tuesday and Wednesday, advising Canadians in areas affected by the current violence to move, if they are able to do so, to more secure regions within or outside of Lebanon. The embassy estimates that there are 1,850
 Canadian expatriates still in Lebanon; most live outside

Beirut, are dual citizens and, for family reasons, do not wish to leave Lebanon.

Due to the uncertainty and difficult conditions which are likely to continue in west Beirut, 11 staff members and three dependants of the Beirut embassy were evacuated from Beirut on Friday, February 10 to Cyprus. Twelve other Canadians were also airlifted out at that time. In addition to embassy staff, a total of 40 Canadians have now arrived in Cyprus. Canadian expatriates continue to leave Beirut in small numbers with the assistance of the embassy. The ambassador, David Jackson, and eight other Canada-based staff, five of whom are military, remain in Beirut.

The security situation has improved somewhat in west Beirut since last week. The militia who control much of the city now appear to be more disciplined and are gradually turning over their security duties to Lebanon's regular police force, the Internal Security Force, which has consistently maintained good relations with all factions. Opening of a crossing point between east and west Beirut for a few hours has eased the shortage of food and medical supplies in west Beirut.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Wednesday, February 15, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

I wish to inform honourable senators that instructions have been issued to the effect that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Austin P.C.).

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I want to begin by extending my congratulations to the movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Senator Bosa had serious remarks to make. His contribution to the work of the Senate has always been positive and I commend him for that. I should like to tell my friend Senator Hébert that he did very well in his first speech before the Senate. His strict and surprising self-discipline with respect to his political views was remarkable. However, I can assure him that we did appreciate the humorous remarks he made during his speech.

This is my first opportunity to congratulate the new senators for their promotion and appointment to the Senate. My only regret as a Conservative is that we would have liked to see them accompanied by two or three Conservative colleagues, something which would have restored a certain balance and given more credibility to the Senate. Well, the Prime Minister did not see it that way. That will not dissuade us from being an outstanding minority in the Senate and assuming our responsibilities, no matter how few of us sit on this side of the house.

I listened with great interest to the speech delivered by Senator Austin last week when he told us about the social security program of his government. I wish Senator Austin could have been with us today to listen to some of my remarks intended for him. He was right to say that we must not lose sight of social security, for too many Canadians still live below the poverty line. For our party, social development and economic development are closely related. Canada's economic situation leaves no room for hope to bring early improvement in our social system. We will have to rethink its philosophy and its structures with a view to finding a better definition of our social security policy. In his speech, the minister took the easy way out. He would have shown more courage had he put more emphasis on the economic recovery. That is where his government has failed miserably. No one in this house will deny that Canada's economic situation is extremely precarious.

Since the last Throne Speech, the Canadian economy has gone through four disastrous years. The 18-month recession in 1981-82 resulted in a 6.5 per cent decrease in Canadian production. The unemployment rate reached a record high of 12.8 per cent. The discount rate of the Bank of Canada went as high as 21.24 per cent. Inflation reached 12.9 per cent. Productivity has decreased by 4.2 per cent since 1979. Our net indebtedness has doubled in just four years. We had a record 10,765 business bankruptcies in 1982. The value of the dollar went down from 94 cents to 76.26 cents. We have had a loss of $16.7 billion in direct investment capital since the last Throne Speech.

Last summer, the Conference Board asked 1,000 Canadian businesses which factors were expected to harm their production during the upcoming six months. The factor which came up most often was the sagging demand, as mentioned by 51 per cent of the respondents. The second most important factor mentioned, by 36 per cent of the respondents, concerned the policies implemented by the government. In third place came the high interest rates, mentioned by 34 per cent of the respondents. This same survey asked businesses which factors were resulting in a decrease in the expected level of investment expenditures in Canada. In the forefront was the sagging demand with 51 per cent of the respondents, government expenditures were second with 34 per cent of the respondents and high interest rates came third with 28 per cent of the respondents.

Canada has the highest unemployment rate of all major industrialized countries but one. At the time of the April 1980 Throne Speech, the unemployment rate was 7.7 per cent. It is now at 11.1 per cent. The seasonally adjusted number of unemployed has increased by 463,000 since the 1980 Throne Speech to reach 1,347,000, and during the same period, there has been a net increase of 1.6 per cent in the level of employment, which is less than the average increase of 3.5 per cent registered in the United States. According to the forecasts published in September 1983 by the Conference Board, the expected rate of growth in the medium term will not be sufficient to create enough jobs to absorb all those who have left the labour market and employ all those who are no longer looking for work. The government may say that they have helped to create 400,000 jobs, but they should add that 600,000 jobs were lost during the recession. The problem affects mostly young people. We even have in this chamber young people who will graduate within a few months or a few years. If you ask them what future they foresee and what job opportunities there are for these young Canadians who are making considerable efforts and sacrifices to attend university, not 5 per cent of them will reply that they are sure to find a job upon graduation.

The same is true for interest rates; after three years of spectacular ups and downs in interest rates, the discount rate has remained stable around 9.5 per cent during the latter part of 1983, while not decreasing at the same rate as inflation. In fact, it increased early in the year by 0.75 per cent and was 4.59 per cent higher than the inflation rate by the end of October. The same is true for farm income which was 22 per cent lower in 1982 than in 1979. From 1979 to 1982, productivity decreased by 4.2 per cent in Canada while it increased by 2.1 per cent in the United States, by 5.9 per cent in Germany, by 8.5 per cent in Japan, by 10.5 per cent in France, by 10.7 per cent in the United Kingdom, and by 11 per cent in Italy.

What about business bankruptcies in 1982, honourable senators? The number of business bankruptcies increased by 33 per cent as compared with 1981 and by 63 per cent as compared with 1980. While the situation has improved somewhat in 1983, the number of business bankruptcies registered during the first ten months of that year exceeds by 85 per cent the number registered during the same period in 1979, and since the Throne Speech, 31,000 businesses have gone bankrupt in Canada.

What is the current state of the government's finances? It has greatly deteriorated over the past four years. Since the last election, the government expenditures in the national accounts have increased by 84 per cent from $54.6 billion to $100.2 billion. The Public Accounts deficit which amounted to $11.4 billion in 1979-80 has now reached $31.3 billion. The net debt has doubled, from $69 billion at the time of the last Throne Speech, it should reach $151 billion by next March. That, honourable senators, is a dismal record for this government. We wish Senator Austin had mentioned the economic future of Canada; because this is a lost cause, he has decided, being the good lawyer he is, not to bring it up. In the County of Ottawa-Carleton, on February 9, 1984, our leader referred to the disastrous state of our economy and tried to speculate on the content of the forthcoming budget. He reminded his audience of the government's economic promises and of the fact that for the past few years the government adhered to the slogan: "Spend now and pay later". We wonder where is the economic wizard of the Liberal Party when its Minister of Finance, after announcing in his last budget speech a tax increase of $4.7 million, suggested that the government would begin reimbursing that amount to the Consolidated Revenue Fund in 1987. The government will then exhaust entirely its borrowing authority and let other people pay the bill. When he met the people of the Ottawa-Carleton area, the leader of our party suggested therefore that a Conservative government, to start the economy moving again, would put forward five priorities. First, it would increase the guaranteed income supplement to help older senior citizens out of poverty. We hear that Mr. Lalonde is about to rob us of this initiative. With his budget, he intends apparently to increase the guaranteed income supplement. I am under the impression that the Progressive Conservative Party has been very wise so far to hide its platform, because the Liberal government has always stolen or borrowed our ideas. We shall wait until the forthcoming election is called to inform the Canadian people of the platform we suggest to put our economy on a sounder basis. Secondly, we should draw up a new investment strategy which would allow a reduction in interest rates and the preservation of present jobs as a priority. Thirdly, we would encourage investments in new plants and capital equipment. Fourthly, we would improve our international competitiveness through increased research and development.

We have to realize in Canada that we have entered an era of extremely advanced technology and that any setback could spell disastrous consequences for our young people who have taken up those new technologies introduced throughout the industrialized countries.

It would also be necessary to reduce our huge deficit of $31 billion! We are told that it could be reduced by $2 billion, but can you imagine that in 1987, the anticipated deficit of the federal government could still be $25 billion! It will take generations before we can balance our budget in Canada. God knows how much foreign investors are concerned about a government which does not have as a priority the reduction of its deficit because such a government has less credibility. But we will deal with those priorities if we are ever called to govern this country. To provide a new impetus, we will have to take every possible means to attract investors. We will perhaps have to alter the so-called FIRA to make requirements for the acceptance of foreign investors more flexible. It does not mean that we are against the Canadianization of industries or an increased Canadian content in our industries or that we would not like them to have a greater share of ownership in their activities, but we also want investors to contribute to our economic development. We also have to carry out a full employment policy. The government has to maintain a high level of credibility. I think this is the fundamental flaw in this government; they have lost the confidence of Canadians. All too often, they have been elected under questionable representations. Honourable senators will recall that in 1974, Mr. Stanfield, who was honesty personified, told Canadian voters that if he were elected, he might have to impose price and wage controls.

We then heard the leading lights of the Liberal Party say "No, we will never accept price and wage controls". Six or seven months later, the same Liberal government, under some pretext, established the Price and Wage Control Commission. That is how Liberals took power in 1974. They played the same trick on us in 1979 when they defeated us on the 18 cents a liter gas tax increase. The Liberal big shots came on television and told us "We will never do that, the increase will be less than 18 cents". It has now reached almost a dollar. However, power is the all important thing for them. So they came into office under these false representations in 1974 and 1979. With the result that the credibility of this government has been seriously affected.

I think this credibility is now further affected by the interne-cine squabbles within the Liberal Party. We are led to wonder where we are going. Are policies adopted in the best interest of Canadians? Are there any leaders left in the Liberal Party? According to reports, the leadership race is already on in the Liberal Party. It is said that Mr. Chrétien has the support of 40 members of Parliament, and Mr. Turner would have still more members supporting him. Other ministers who have leadership ambitions are doing the same thing, they compete with each other to introduce the most attractive legislation for the people.

We have the Minister of Justice, Mr. MacGuigan, who is introducing a series of amendments to the Criminal Code. This has not been done for a long time. And we are also told Mr. MacGuigan intends to run for the Liberal leadership. I could mention as well Mr. Roberts and others.

I suggest the problem in the Liberal Party is that they have already started a race to replace someone who is not leaving and who is not prepared to leave.

Marcel Adam wrote an article in La Presse on February 11, 1984. I will quote from it, to bring into focus the current views on the Liberal Party:

If the Liberal Government is in bad shape, the party in power is not faring any better, as shown in a report from the Reform Committee of the LPC published last week.

The report of that committee made up of MPs and supporters from all parts of the country is in fact a working paper to be submitted in a few weeks to associations and the membership at large for a final report on the health of the Liberal Party.

It was entrusted with the task of diagnosing the Party's ailments after the November 1982 convention when a resolution condemning among other things electoral manipulations, patronage and propaganda orchestrated by certain all-powerful and untouchable advisors in the Prime Minister's Office.

I am not singling out Senator Davey and he is not named in that article. Apparently, he is one of those to be closely scrutinized.

The committee finds that the party is in full disarray and lists its ailments: predominance of the leader, lack of communication between the Party and the caucus, inadequate resources preventing it from counterbalancing the caucus, lack of Party control over the funds that are properly his and that are moreover inadequate.

Not only is the Party not taken seriously by the caucus, but the leader has effective control over both party policies and finance as well as over candidates and MPs.

The Party has become a mere electoral machine that is cranked up every four years but is practically condemned to inaction and inefficiency in the meantime. The impact is particularly dramatic in Western Canada where the LPC, with two MPs only, is in a drastically debile condition.

The committee courageously concludes that the Liberal Party is paying the price for its long stay in power, namely, the loss of its idealism. Which is tantamount to saying it has been corrupted by power.

The author concludes as follows:

A party that is returned to opposition once in a while purifies itself, rejuvenates itself . . .

We, Conservatives, have been too long in opposition. We are completely purified, washed of all the sins of the world. He goes on to say:

. . . it does a self-examination in the light of the principles that originally were its raison d'être. It listens to the people . . .

This is very important.

. . . and particularly to its members. In that sense, it is said that a party returned to opposition goes through purgatory.

The Liberal Party has been in paradise too long. It might very well end its days in purgatory. I think this malaise, as described by Mr. Adam, is a reality.

He refers to the party paper criticizing its structures and its directions. During that time, a general election is delayed because they hope that the peace mission can still save the Liberal government. There is nothing contentious in the Prime Minister's initiative, honourable senators. We all want to avoid a nuclear war. It is a motherhood issue.

No Canadian has questioned the Prime Minister's initiative. The leader of our party has quite clearly said so. I think that the majority of Canadians endorse Mr. Trudeau's initiatives. He has received the full support of our party, as I said, when he took some initiatives at the international level to promote peace. We would have liked, as it was stated in the other place, the entire Parliament to pass a unanimous resolution endorsing the Prime Minister's initiative for peace. When the Prime Minister of Canada speaks in Canada or abroad, he is no longer the leader of the Liberal Party but the Prime Minister of Canada. This is why we would have liked the Prime Minister to obtain, through a unanimous resolution in the House of Commons and the Senate, a serious endorsement of his peace mission which would have appeared less partisan. It would have had more weight internationally. We know that his attitude towards NATO has irritated many Canadians. For our national security, we need the help of NATO much more than that of the Warsaw Pact. Neutrality on the part of our leaders will only lessen our influence within NATO. Everyone knows that.

It is also in those terms that the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons spoke on February 9. It is worthwhile to quote a few of his comments because he raised a very serious point. Mr. Mulroney had this to say:

Canada has for many years taken pride in its ability to play the role of honest broker in world affairs. This is a valid and important role for Canada. The Prime Minister's initiative is, I believe, intended to be in this tradition.

It is with some concern, and no sense of partisanship, that I note an apparent confusion in the Prime Minister's statement between on the one hand, the role of Alliance member and, on the other, some neutralist observer of international affairs.

That confusion arises, I believe, from the Prime Minister's apparent willingness to understate the value of some very important principles in the hope of making some progress with his proposals for peace.

We are a Western Nation, a member of NATO.

We are committed to the ideals of individual and collective freedoms. We are children of liberty. On these principles we cannot and shall not compromise.

We are prepared to accept neither the inexorable financialization of Europe nor a neutralist Canada.

We in the Western Alliance are prepared to defend ourselves against attempts to impose alien and odious systems on us through the use of force or threats of force.

That is why NATO should quite properly be the forum for our initiatives.

In Toronto last December 4, prior to his departure for Brussels, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs to urge further consideration of the existing non-first strike policy within the private councils of NATO foreign ministers.

This is an important statement on foreign policy on which a future Conservative government will reflect.

Honourable senators, we will have some challenges to take up. The main one, if such is the wish of the Canadian electorate, will be to replace this government and give to the Conservative Party an opportunity to present new ideas or directions, to rejuvenate as it were a federal administration which is marking time and can hardly renew itself. It is a difficult challenge. We are aware of it but we are ready and prepared to take up the challenge.

On motion of Senator Côtteau, debate adjourned.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—
(Honourable Senator Le Moyné).

Hon. Jean Le Moyné: Honourable Senators, "We have concluded that the Canadian Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada."

Those, honourable senators, are the first words of the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Senate Reform. Still on the first page, fifth paragraph, we read the following:

Some highly respected people in public life and in the academic community prefer a reformed system of appointment to election. Among this group is one member of our Committee.

I am that member. Today, I must justify my stand. According to parliamentary custom, I should be repeating the tried and true formula that I am happy to take part in this debate on Senate reform, but in all sincerity, I must say I am most unhappy. If I had my "druthers", there would have been no joint committee and no recommendation for an elected Senate. We would have had an independent Senate committee whose terms of reference would be to proceed with a purely internal reform, to be voted on by the Senate itself. It would have been a strictly family affair. Alas, it was not to be, and our fate is no longer in our own hands. Whatever we decide, the other place and a number of lesser places can disregard our decision.

From the outset I was interested in the terms of reference of our committee because of the zeal I felt almost from the very beginning for the Senate, for this house, a zeal that may not be sufficiently enlightened but of the ardour of which I am certainly not ashamed. As a member of the committee, I was an active participant to the very end because I saw a need to reform the Senate so that it could express its full potential, which is there intact but is not being used to its full extent, for reasons I shall not go into at this time. I endorsed, often without enthusiasm and sometimes reluctantly, all the conclusions of the committee, except, of course, the principal one, because I found they were likely to promote the internal reform I still had in mind. I continue to hope that once the election concept has been rejected for good, the Senate will finally have an opportunity to examine the rest of the recommendations with prudence and discretion.

When the committee received the sage counsel of such eminent former senators as Eugene Forsey and George J. McIlraith, I had already taken a position, guided, I dare say, by a sound senatorial instinct... Subsequent carefully wrought statements by Senators Hicks and Donahoe, as well as various important papers, including the lucid and vigorous speech by Senator Langlois in which he defended true Senate reform in 1973, all of these finally caused my views to gel and I made up my mind once and for all.

[English]

Honourable senators, to my sincere sorrow, this means, among other things, that even the magisterial presentation made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate on his home base of Winnipeg failed to sway me, however impressed I was by the impassioned logic that is the constant signature of my distinguished colleague.

The proceedings and the report of the committee leave indeed very little untrodden ground, and I know well that I cannot pretend to any originality. I intend to limit my remarks to certain aspects—perhaps not overemphasized—of the report's main thrust and, by associating freely, to attempt to throw, however pale, a valid light on some of the far-reaching consequences of an elected Senate.

Honourable senators, the report obviously does not deal primarily with reform; rather, it deals with revolution, and, along with its first conclusion, it deals Canada a revolutionary hand to play.

Allow me to stress some necessary distinctions. Reforms happen inside given systems without introducing any strange or new element; they merely displace and reorganize pre-existing elements. They seek the betterment of the systems concerned through a process of circumspect intervention, akin to a stimulated and guided evolution, the effect of which is some rearrangement.

However, revolutions force into the systems strange or new elements that by their sole presence determine a sudden mutation at the deepest level of being; they mean a change of form, a change of essence; they entail the emergence of new species.

Briefly, a reform will act on the structures and dynamics of its object without touching its essence. A revolution aims at the core of being and alters the essence.

The specific difference in this Senate resides in the fact that its members are appointed. If they become elected, one way or another this Senate will no longer exist; this institution will become essentially different. As something totally else, it would find itself in a displaced orbit in the parliamentary cosmos and would enter an unpredictable order of relations with the whole of external reality. It would be the beginning of a long and, in view of the fragile cohesion of our vast country, dangerous political adventure.

An elective process has no congruence whatever with a Senate of this kind because, among other reasons, the main effect of such a mode of recruitment is the abolition of the peculiar distance existing between the members of this place and the citizenry at large, an immense group which comprises a very special breed of people called electors. The distance is expressed in the fact that senators do not depend on the electorate; their fate and tenure are not linked to the machinery of democracy.

[Translation]

The Senate is not a total stranger to the electoral process, since it is indirectly a product thereof. In fact, those who appoint senators are themselves elected or are the creatures of elected authorities. However, from a healthy distance and from its own salutary heights, in our political system the Senate helps to contain the totalitarian tendencies of democracy taken to the extreme. This mania for democracy would have us vote on anything and everything and would have everyone everywhere bow to the pressures of so-called popular consensus.

George-Étienne Cartier understood the need for institutional distance and height which I insist are necessary. He wrote:

There must be an authority that resists the democratic element if institutions are to remain stable and work in harmony.

This is taken from the green paper on Senate reform. Perhaps I should add that the authors of this working paper were careful not to dwell on this point. They seem to have put this major element of Cartier's philosophy in a context that would defuse it, as it were... Another comment: The distance referred to here is not that which in Great Britain separates the Lords from the Commons—it is not aristocratic in nature. It resides only in the fact of not being elected. In his speech in 1973 to which I referred earlier, the Honourable Senator Langlois gave a very interesting comparison of the typical aspects of the House of Lords and the characteristics of our Senate.

These memorable remarks by our distinguished colleague still apply today.

I think I soon felt a very real affinity between the Senate and the judiciary. The main analogy is of course the act of judging. The Senate judges, which is, in fact, its primary role. What does the Senate judge? The state of things. First of all, bills, which are comparable to some possible future state of things, this corresponding to its function of re-examining and reconsidering. It also judges situations, events that are taking place—that is, the actual state of things—by virtue of its function to inquire and investigate.

According to some of the recommendations in the committee's report, the Senate will judge even more and its competence will be even more extensive.

According to our system, all judges are appointed. Throughout the world, judges are "raised". They are assigned to a tribunal, to a bench, which by isolating the judge and raising him above the people makes him stand out. His appointment is a "raising", since in English, we say that judges are raised to the bench. The legitimacy and authority of a judge arise from the legitimacy and the authority of those who appoint him and raise him to his judicial function.

He is not required to justify his appointment other than by his good judgments and good conduct. Any evaluation thereof is left to his peers. A judge does not have to worry about the opinion of his fellow citizens. It is up to him to judge them, according to the authority of the court he represents.

Since it is one of the Senate's functions to judge, the Senate, like the judiciary, is set apart, and its members are appointed or summoned. They are certainly not summoned "downstairs", so that strictly speaking, the Senate is not the second chamber but the upper chamber.

● (1520)

[English]

It follows, honourable senators, that it would be most improper for the members of an upper house like this one, or of any court of justice for that matter, to step down from their seats and benches to scramble for some supplementary coins of legitimacy among, from their point of view, throngs of electing tourists. But if ever future senators have to go through the candidate avatar, well, this Senate will be no more, for it will then have been . . . it will then have been mutated into a subspecies of the genus lower house. It will have become a true second house, a very secondary House of Commons.

As it was constituted, the Senate does not rest on public opinion; it was not conceived to be carried by public opinion; it does not need to be confirmed by it. The Senate is its own and sole judge and it should not acknowledge any other judge.

To maintain the distance and to keep the hauteur which are of the goods of the Senate is not easy in the prevailing climate made up of a contagious feeling of guilt which infects anything that is not sanctioned by Madame Everywoman and by Mr. Everyman. Certain currents of opinion regarding this or that—or the case of the Senate, for example—might well be generated by guilt or, perhaps, merely by uneasiness: the guilt of being different; the unease of having to stand apart without the benefit, if I may say so, of some amorphous collective blessing. Yes, it needs courage, but also sheer obduracy and a holy dose of stubbornness to resist the quasi-mystic forces of universal levelling inspired and sustained by false prophecy. And what is false prophecy? Nothing else but the subtle and omnipresent temptation of mediocrity.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, do we really need that much courage to act on the authority directly conferred on us by an unquestioned authority, to accept a legitimacy arising from an inviolable legitimacy? Are we so impressionable that a few polls and public opinion—whose spontaneity is as questionable as that of a melting snowball being made bigger and bigger by the children rolling it—are enough to raise the spectre of self-doubt and make us recant? The elective option would, in its way, be tantamount to apostasy.

Beware of the power of fashion, whether we are talking about philosophy, manners or clothing, or legitimacy, or individual and regional alienation. Fashion is powerful enough to tempt and seduce scholars and philosophers. Politicians are certainly not immune to its wiles, nor probably are political commentators and historians who are anxious to reform others.

Who cares whether Lilliput or Laputa or Australia have an elected Senate? We have a Senate whose members are legitimately chosen by legitimate authority, and which has provided and always will provide an invaluable service to this country, services so discreet and so unspectacular that they are not or are hardly known to their principal beneficiary, the general public. They are often scarcely recognized by those long-winded providers of advice who think they have said all there is to say after quoting one or two reports with catchy titles that manage to attract a basically honest but otherwise superficial readership.

If Canada is the only developed country that has a Senate like this one, let us first appreciate the originality of this institution before hiding our heads in shame, and let us consider how the Senate's originality is suited to the Canadian situation and whether it would not be more realistic, more expedient and better for the country to educate the public instead of putting up with complacent or condescending attitudes, however well-intentioned they may be.

[English]

I think we are unanimous on the need for Senate reform, but I do not think this house is in such a state of disrepair that it needs rebuilding on entirely new foundations. Its defects and deficiencies are of the kind that have to be expected in any institution as important and venerable as this one. I see nothing wrong in the Senate that would not be corrected by some moderate but serious reforms. I recognize that some areas are particularly sensitive—first of all, the crucial process of nomination where necessary corrections must extend to the redoubtable source itself, then the problems of term and attendance, then the question of work distribution. I am convinced that solutions in each case are within the range of the status quo without undue disturbance in the present set-up.

There would be widespread disappointment and frustration, for nothing would turn out to be sensational or spectacular. In my view, such outside reactions are none of our business.

● (1530)

Of course, if we are not consumed—up to a point, to be sure—by our zeal for this house (Ps. 69:9) we shall fail. But, honourable senators, I know that there is a high degree of virtue in this place and an ample amount of it for reform. There is in the Senate an abundance of human substance of the highest order. This very fact alone would prevent me from accepting the prospect of an elected upper house. How could I ever bring myself to shunt aside, so to speak, so many of my distinguished colleagues, how could I ever become inconsiderate enough to dismiss them as irrelevant and illegitimate in the legislative train, and not even good enough for recycling through the electoral grinders and sieves, and other more or less discriminating machines of democracy?

Having faithfully listened to them during debates in this house, having observed them attentively in the course of our committee deliberations, I have been led to a high degree of reverence and admiration. Nowhere have I encountered such dedication to the common weal and to the affairs of state, such competence and acuity, such sagacity and persistence. To an old novice like myself, most of the sittings in this chamber, or in the austere audit rooms where committees convene, are priceless lessons in human praxis, as well as great intellectual treats. Honourable senators may rest assured that, however warm my feelings, I do not idealize them, nor am I being too easily enthusiastic about them. My appreciation of things can be quite objective. That is why I dare to say that the exercise of sober second thought, which I so often witness, particularly in committee, is not only very sober but also extremely dry, and that for all participants with experience and learning, even for those who merely bring simple but strong goodwill, the sittings are ordeals, but ordeals in the most positive sense of the word, that is, occasions of optimum challenge.

I may at times have sounded a little harsh, but I never intended to disparage any person or institution. As to public opinion, I am not prone to take that into account regarding my thinking or writing. I stand outside of its currents as much as possible. Nevertheless, if my fervour has forced a note of harshness now and then, I hope to be forgiven. I was speaking always from the point of view not of Sirius but of the Senate of Canada, a noble enough vantage point. Given time, I could well have spoken just as warmly of the other place, which I recognize as being the first house, the main chamber. But a strict distinction had to be maintained, even on the emotional plane. It is from the other place that the bulk of legislation originates. The other place is the legislative spring, where members are exposed pitilessly to the existential stuff of politics, living in political immediacy, encountering all of the constraints of daily life in their activity as delegates of the people and interpreters of the popular will. Senators, however, are protected from all direct public pressure in the freedom and integrity of their reflection and judgment, and therefore this place must be a house of high honour.

I hope that the nightmare of a possible elected Senate will be dissipated by a sudden and unequivocal awakening in both houses, so that our fate as senators will not be similar to that of a so-called major league professional hockey team—the Ottawa Senators—which flourished in the 1920s, and which is now extinct and as forgotten as the dodo.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Would he agree that the seeming obsession with the legitimacy of the Senate as a non-elected body is merely a bias that illustrates nothing more than a failure to understand the distinction between authority and the delegation of authority?

Senator Le Moynes: I have never considered the question from that point of view; but I consider that the current obsession with the question of legitimacy is related to a diffused feeling of guilt.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Steuart, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE
CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Molson calling the attention of the Senate to certain activities of the National Film Board and, in particular, to the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—
(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I understand from Senator Nurgitz that it is not his intention to participate in this debate and that he is prepared to yield to Senator Everett.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, recently a group of us were taken by Senator Molson to see the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" presented by the National Film Board. As honourable senators know, that is the so-called documentary produced on the life and exploits of Billy Bishop.

It is true that the film, which runs for approximately an hour and a half, was produced in a documentary style, but it draws largely on the fictional stage play, based loosely on fact, called "Billy Bishop Goes to War", which many honourable senators may have seen.

The producer of the film, Mr. Cowan, has tried to establish a case against Billy Bishop which suggests that he won the Victoria Cross, and several other medals for heroism, because he lied about the kill count he was able to achieve. The producer, in his film, starts off with innuendo, giving the impression that Bishop was a ne'er do well and hell raiser, that he was thrown out of RMC, and that his career in the Royal Flying Corps was based largely on the intercession of powerful friends. The film makes a great deal of the fact that Bishop often flew alone and that following his return from a mission he would state that he had shot down one or more planes.

In the film there is portrayed a mechanic named Walter Bourne, who serviced Bishop's planes. At no time is there any direct quote from Walter Bourne because apparently none has been preserved. What is heard is a composite of complaints from others, and comments that the producer obtained as a result of his investigation. An actor is used to convey the impression that the quotes originated from the mouth of Walter Bourne.

The main part of the case against Bishop concerns the famous Estoumel raid for which Bishop was awarded the Victoria Cross. As honourable senators know, that was the raid in which Bishop set off early one morning and destroyed a number of aircraft on the ground at a German airfield. Cowan bases his case on the fact that no German records were found of the destruction of that airfield.

But as the Air Force Association has pointed out, Cowan ignores the testimony of captured German pilots, British intelligence behind the German lines and a Royal Air Force pilot who flew over that particular field and saw the destruction that Bishop had caused, that the raid did occur. I suppose one can go either way on the matter. One can say that it is more important that the German records did not substantiate Bishop's claim, although one must remember that the records were destroyed during the war, or that the three elements I have just mentioned are the right ones. The point is the producer did not give you that choice. He merely stated that there were no German records found to indicate that the raid had taken place.

Then the film comes back to Walter Bourne, who was played very skilfully by the same actor who played the role of Billy Bishop in "Billy Bishop Goes to War." In the film Bourne states that Bishop landed his plane, took the Lewis gun off the plane and shot holes in the plane's fabric. Bourne states that he must have done that because a Lewis gun could not be removed in the air. Is it not just as rational to assume that if Bishop actually landed the plane and took the gun off, he could just as easily put it back on and not leave the evidence that the gun was off? Bourne also states that the bullet holes formed a circle. He said that he had never seen a plane come back from combat with bullet holes in one particular spot but, rather, they were always sprayed all over the plane. Bishop knocked down 72 aircraft. Surely he would know better than Bourne that bullets spray and that in a dog fight the holes are not concentrated in one place. Mr. Cowan makes the point that King George V had always wanted to award the Victoria Cross, the Distinguished Service Order and the Military Cross to the same person at the same time, which is what he did with Bishop. The narrator goes on to say that "what the king wants the king gets." That is the case which Cowan establishes against Bishop.

What are we to think? First, in any situation of this nature free comment is reasonable; Mr. Cowan is entitled to his opinion and nobody can argue against that. However, his allegations are totally unproven. This is not a balanced investigation that allows the viewer to take the facts on one side and put them up against the facts on the other side or to determine how the facts relate to the allegations. It is done by innuendo and by one-sided suggestions. We must also remember, as Senator Molson pointed out, that this film was produced by the National Film Board, the sort of organization that should be dedicated to concern for truth. The film has been sold to the Public Broadcasting System of the United States. I understand that it is being shown in Canadian consulates and embassies throughout the world. The reaction of an editor of the U.S. News and World Report as to what effect the film will have on people who see it is interesting. He says, in part:

Is it possible for Canadians to go further in self-hatred? You damn your own man with faint praise and swallow the myth of your enemies. The NFB tore Bishop to shreds more effectively than any German Fokker.

I believe that Senator Molson's suggestion of the other day is eminently fair, since the National Film Board is a government agency and since people in other countries will be inclined to take what it says as being reasonably judicious and fair. As reported in Hansard at page 191, he said:

—I suggest that the National Film Board be requested by the minister to withdraw this film for full editing, to cut out all unsubstantiated charges of fraud or lying, and that the minister request the Department of External Affairs to stop immediately the showing of this film in our consulates and embassies until it is properly edited.

Honourable senators, I would like to deal briefly with what I think is a more serious innuendo in the film. I think that Bishop maintains himself as an authentic hero. It is true his claims may sometimes be unsubstantiated, but in war that often is the case. Sometimes people who are heroes go unrecognized and people who are not quite as brave get the medals. It is true that there must be heroes in war. It is true in war that not always the nicest people are the best fighters. But it seems to me that I would rather go into the ring with a heavyweight professional knowing something about boxing than I would without any knowledge at all. The fact is that, despite this film and despite the attempts of the producer to the contrary, Bishop comes out as an ace. We call someone an ace when he has shot down five planes. He may be 10 per cent out and shot down only 60 planes instead of 72, but he was still one hell of a flyer and a hero. So I am not too worried about what happens to Bishop in the film, although I agree with Senator Molson's suggestion.

However, the basic premise of the film is that all wars are fought by blood-thirsty generals who itch to get into war, that arms build-up inevitably leads to war, that World War I was fought to preserve a useless aristocracy and for no other reason, and, finally, that war is horrible and should be avoided at all costs.

It is interesting that nowhere in the film is there any suggestion that we should ever stand up and fight for our principles or beliefs. I do not remember World War I, but I certainly remember World War II. That war was fought to prevent a madman from taking over the world because we believed that our freedom was worth standing up for.

• (1550)

I suppose one can talk about peace at any price; but I would suggest that in the Second World War more lives were lost because of the concept of peace at any price than would have been lost by building up a defence against Hitler. To me, the essential question seems to be: Are our beliefs worth fighting for? War is unthinkable; but living under a communist dictatorship is equally unthinkable. There is no easy way to resolve these two issues, but to resolve them on the basis of peace at any price is absolutely wrong.

What I have against the movie is that Bishop was denigrated to prove that point. In my judgment, he deserves much better treatment than that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

AFFAIRS OF THE AGED

MOTION TO ESTABLISH DIVISION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Benidickson, P.C.:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the establishment of a Division of the Affairs of the Aged, with responsibility, insofar as the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, for promoting the welfare of aged people in Canada by

- (i) planning and helping to plan Government of Canada policies on the affairs of the aged, in particular, in the areas of human rights, income security, employment, retirement and public services, including housing, nutrition, health care, education and recreation;
- (ii) administering such Acts of the Parliament of Canada and such orders and regulations of the Government of Canada as are assigned to it;
- (iii) coordinating policies, in both the public and private sectors, affecting the aged;
- (iv) carrying out research and dispensing information on the affairs of the aged; and
- (v) engaging in such other activities as are considered conducive to this goal by the Governor-in-Council. (Honourable Senator Croll).

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I last spoke to this matter on February 7. Before continuing my remarks, I wish to call to the attention of honourable senators a report by the National Council on Welfare on the incomes of the aged entitled "Sixty-Five and Older". This report is related to what I had to say previously and it is worth reading. I recommend it to honourable senators.

Last week I spoke to the question of establishing a federal division on aging. What I had in mind in that respect was something along the lines of the Ministry of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. I think that is an important area, although much less important than the problem of aging. The problem of aging concerns every Canadian since the problems besetting older people in our society lie in wait for all of us. The Senate has a special responsibility to speak out for the elderly—we are not regarded as a youth club. Whatever the present situation every man and woman in Canada faces the same prospect—he or she must grow old. Of course, that comes as no surprise. What is surprising and, indeed, what is disturbing is the disregard with which we as a nation habitually treat our older people. The sad fact is that, by and large, the elderly are still forgotten constituents in our youth oriented society.

Most people seem to think, when they think about it at all, that our older people are getting along quite well. After all, do they not have old age pensions, the guaranteed income supplement, spouses' allowance, Canada pension, private pensions and some savings? Do they not have their own children to look after them? On paper there might seem to be no urgent reason for concern. Those of us who have looked into the problem, as did the 1966 Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, know only too well that such benefits, helpful though they may well be, are not distributed evenly throughout the older population, and in far too many cases are either missing altogether or are hopelessly inadequate.

The elderly are an underprivileged minority. The plight of the elderly in our society, as singled out by the penury of older women, for special mention, is nothing short of a national disgrace. Unattached older women in our society are the poorest of the poor. They deserve better.

In a moment I will say something about the needs of the elderly and what government can and should be doing to meet those needs. However, first, I want to warn against any tendency to feel complacent, since what we are now doing for our elderly will be spread even thinner in the years to come. That is because the proportion of older people in our population is steadily and relentlessly increasing. Already there are many who fall between the cracks in our system and there will be many more.

The physician-priests of Assyria and Egypt believed that old age and death were not inevitable; the same hope was cherished later by the physicians of Rome, Greece and the Arab world. During the Dark Ages the elixir of life was the object of a continuing search. We know better now, although we have managed to extend human life to a remarkable extent.

Canada has always considered herself a young country. Well, that is no longer true. The aging process affects nations just as it does people, and Canada has already become an old country. By United Nations standards this happens when more than 8 per cent of a country's population is over the age of 65. The proportion of Canada's population over this age is now 9.7 per cent, and increasing. Demographers tell us that this trend will not be reversed.

Why is this? The answer is simple. At one end of the scale we are witnessing a steadily declining birth rate, and at the other a rising life expectancy. Looking ahead the result will be that over the next 50 years or so the proportion of Canadians over 65 will double from the almost 10 per cent at the present time to more than 20 per cent by the year 2031.

While improvement in the mortality statistics has been notable for people of all ages, the latest available North American statistics show that most of the added time has come to the life expectancies of people 45 and older. In fact, the statistics for the period 1971-80 show that the improvement has been particularly notable for the 65-year age group.

• (1600)

Life expectancy after 65 in the 1941-51 period averaged 13.8 years. By 1969, the average had risen to 15 years. Moreover, in just one decade ending in 1980, male life expectancy had risen to 14.1 additional years after 65 and female life expectancy had risen by 18.5 years. Since most males take wives younger than themselves, is it any wonder that there are so many unattached women in the over-65 group within our population?

Improvements in health care and continued advances in medical science and drug therapy are expected gradually to push life expectancy up even further, according to a spokesman for the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Industry which represents 170 life insurance companies.

The extension of life for those over 65 has been unprecedented. Life expectancy improved more in the 1971-80 period than in the previous 20 to 30 years. It has affected both sexes and all races. The numbers involved are not small. As of June 3, 1981, there were 4,381,000 people in Canada over 55, and more than half of that number were 65 or older.

Of course, there is no guarantee that one will live to the limit of one's life expectancy. Many people do not realize that, when actuaries provide an expectancy figure of, say, 15 years, it does not mean that all of the people in the group are expected to live to the end of that period. Rather, it means that half of them will be alive at the statistical limit. In actual fact it is an even bet, and those who are in poor health or living on an inadequate income will predominate among the losers. Putting it another way, according to the population projections of Statistics Canada, the number of our elderly citizens is increasing at the rate of two per cent per annum, which is approximately twice the rate of growth of the population as a whole. What does that mean? Simply, that our existing programs and facilities, which are already inadequate, will be totally unable to cope with a 100 per cent increase in demand.

The final report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging defined seven areas of concern for the elderly: Income status and security; employment status and opportunities; health status and health care; housing status and needs; community services for older people; research and statistics; planning and co-ordination. As I said a moment ago, we have not yet begun to deal adequately with any of these areas of concern. How shall we fare when the elderly comprise not a tenth but a fifth of our population? As a nation, we last took a serious look at the problem 20 years ago through the Senate Committee on Aging, and action on the issue is long overdue.

The effect of these demographic trends will be almost incalculable. Let me outline just a few of the problems that already exist and will become much worse as the proportion of seniors increases. We cannot change the inevitable, but surely we can prepare to cope with it. According to census data, in 1975 the average income of families headed by 45 to 54 year-olds was $19,955. In the same year, unattached pensioners had an average income from all sources of $3,769 and couples who were pensioners averaged $8,746. Almost half of all pensioners were below the poverty level and that figure included 61 per cent of all unattached senior citizens. Honourable senators will note that particulars of the poverty level are in the material now before them.

The situation has hardly changed since 1975. By 1978, some 54 per cent of all pensioners were poor enough to be receiving the guaranteed income supplement and 19 per cent of all seniors were totally dependent on Old Age Security Guaranteed Income Supplement Benefits. In 1983, 50 per cent of people over 65 lived on less than $7,000 a year. This is not a record we can be proud of. A reference to the poverty level particulars I have provided will show that the figure of $7,000 is very low. Since 43 per cent of the population have no income from private pensions or investments, retirement means destitution for many Canadians. It does not take a great deal of imagination to predict that our pensioners will be falling behind every year as their numbers increase.

An enormous effort is required to correct these deficiencies. It will take larger and larger contributions to government-sponsored programs, both by government and by employers and employees, to meet even a reasonable escalation of need among our retired population. As well, fundamental changes will be required in the portability, vesting, indexing and survivor provisions of employer-sponsored programs. These changes, in themselves, will not even be sufficient, since the latter plans provide Canadians over 65 with a mere 13 per cent of their retirement income, while government plans provide over 50 per cent. However, that is not the end of the story. In our society the older or retired sector has traditionally depended upon the youthful majority to fund its social security. Given present demographic trends, such a structure can no longer be taken for granted. At the present time there are approximately five workers to one pensioner. By the year 2031, the ratio will have fallen to two workers for every one pensioner. By any standard, that ratio will be inadequate to support the kind of social security system to which we are accustomed.

Economic factors, however, do not tell the whole story. In addition, the elderly have traditionally depended upon the youthful majority to provide not only financial assistance but psychological security as well. That, too, can no longer be taken for granted.

Given the decline in the birth rate, the incidence of one-child families and the the increasing rate of divorce, elderly people in the future will have much less opportunity for family support than they have had in the past. This lack of family support will cause the demand for social services by senior citizens to grow more rapidly than the actual increase in the elderly population.

The report of the Senate Committee on Aging in 1966 pointed out that in a changing society, based on technical and scientific achievement, the experience and wisdom of the old are often at a discount. This is highly destructive to the self-esteem of the aged, and they find it increasingly difficult to maintain a satisfying foothold in the community. Our treatment of them since the publication of that report cannot be said to have helped the situation.

There are countries where the old have lower standards of living than in Canada but greater involvement in society and a greater sense of worth. Changes of attitude are needed here, and a division on aging could do important work in shaping those changes. When attitudes are changed, society will change with them.

If I have sketched a bleak future for our elderly people, it is based on fact and on projections made by qualified professionals. I remind honourable senators that I have thus far dealt with only the first of the seven areas of concern I alluded to a moment ago. The outlook in most of the other areas—for example, employment opportunities, housing needs and community services—is equally dismal.

Let me turn to employment opportunities for a moment. Here the first evil is mandatory retirement based on age—still very much with us in Canada. Here is what the Chairman of the United States House Select Committee on Aging said on that subject:

“Age-based retirement arbitrarily severs productive people from their livelihood, squanders their talents, sears their health, strains an already overburdened social security system, and drives many elderly people into poverty and despair. Ageism is as odious as racism and sexism.”

Who can disagree with those words? They apply only too accurately to the situation in Canada. And, under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, next year we will have disposed of mandatory retirement.

The report of Statistics Canada on employment opportunities for the elderly is appalling, and not just for people of 65 and over. In our society, obsolescence begins at 40. Middle managers who are terminated in their 40s and 50s encounter acute difficulty in relocating. It is a phenomenon of our times. The sad truth is that the older you are when you lose your job, the harder it is to find a new one, regardless of talent and experience. Ironically, the pension plans of many companies help to bar the entry of older employees into jobs.

The same depressing picture exists in every one of the seven areas of concern I spoke of earlier. The outlook for older people in Canada is bad indeed, and it is getting worse.

Honourable senators, we cannot wait for a miracle to happen. These problems will not go away. They are not about to solve themselves. Indeed, according to Statistics Canada, they are going to get worse; much worse. It is up to us to see that they get better.

What is to be done? In my view, the proposal to set up a federal division on aging deserves our most serious consideration as a first, major step in our search for solutions. I see it as the best way to marshal the knowledge and resources necessary to deal with these problems. Up to this point efforts have been fragmented among many conflicting jurisdictions, and the elderly have suffered for it. We need the knowledge, the funding, and the clout of the federal government to do the job.

That is why I vigorously support the concept of a division on aging. I do not say that by establishing such a department we will solve all the problems of our older people; the social and financial issues involved are difficult, and they call for more than good will.

We are entitled to ask: What can a division on aging do for our elderly people that is not already being done by somebody else somewhere in Canada? In fact, its absence is a large part of the problem. There are many facilities and services, public and private, and many programs, federal, provincial and municipal, but no one is co-ordinating them. There is a disturbing drift away from uniformity in provincial pension legislation, which is seen by Lawrence Coward of William M. Mercer Limited as a balkanization that can be costly and destructive. That is actually happening in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Quebec.

Needs vary widely in different sections of the country. For example, at the present time Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan have a substantially higher percentage of people over 65 than do any of the other provinces. Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario, while somewhat lower, are expected to experience increases in their share of the national older population. As a result, there are differing problems that differ across the country and for which only the federal government can make provision.

A division on aging would not only unify the federal response to the issue but would also advance federal-provincial negotiations in this all-important field and would permit the co-ordination of federal-provincial policy and long-term planning. Remember, we must look at the long haul. The year 2031 seems a long way off today, but the projected increase in our older population has already begun and is growing inexorably every year. The crisis will not start suddenly in 2031; it is developing right now.

There are many reasons why the federal government should set up a division on aging. Not the least is the fact that as the senior partner in the Canadian federation it is the one body that can promote solutions, consolidate ideas, and investigate and, to a large degree, direct problems relating to a social issue of this magnitude.

It is only through federal-provincial co-operation that we have developed the broad social legislation that we enjoy today. Through similar co-operation we can come to collective grips with the problems of an aging society.

Aging is not a process affecting just individuals or regions. The western industrialized world has recognized that, and the United Nations suggested some years ago that every country should set up a national commission on aging. In a world of interdependent economies there is need for international exchanges of ideas, policies and solutions, and for that the federal presence is required.

When the Honourable Monique Bégin announced the establishment of a national bureau on aging within the Department of National Health and Welfare, I applauded the move. But it is no more than a minimal response to a national problem.

In considering the concept of a division on aging, we must determine what responsibilities it should have. There are two obviously important aspects of federal involvement: the income tax system and social security. Without attempting to deal with either of these areas in depth, I suggest that a separate division could make a significant contribution in both areas.

The taxing power enables Parliament to regulate at the federal level the taxes to be paid by individuals. It can take into account the amount of tax that an older person pays, and it does so by adjusting exemptions for those who are 65 and over. It also takes initiatives to restructure the tax base more equitably.

The taxing power also gives the federal government leverage in areas such as private pension plans, usually a matter of contract within provincial powers. For an aging population, there are a number of reasons for concern arising from the taxation rules for pension plans. There is also the matter of portability. A society such as ours, which benefits from mobility of workers, will have to encourage total portability in the interest of workers of all ages, but especially for those approaching retirement. The tax structure can be adjusted to promote such portability, which virtually everyone agrees is desirable. Here, a division on aging could serve to co-ordinate the needed change of rules across the country and to promote an enlightened taxation philosophy with regard to older people.

It is true that the taxation rules are extremely complex and are tied to the tax structure in general. There is no suggestion that Revenue Canada should not continue its present administrative and processing functions. Nevertheless, a division on aging could play a large investigative and co-ordinating role in all areas of taxation affecting the elderly.

It could play an important role as well in the field of social security. The cornerstone of the federal government's old age security structure is comprised of the Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security, Spouse Allowance and the Guaranteed Income Supplement. The Canada Pension Plan also deals with survivorship problems. These programs are administered along with family allowances which cover a very different age group—those under 65. Consolidation of the various income security plans within the division on aging would be logical and feasible. At the present time, the plans are administered by a department which has other, enormous responsibilities. The new division would provide a highly practical alternative.

Honourable senators, I am not attempting to lay out a detailed blueprint of the proposed division. I am merely trying to outline some of the problems that exist and to suggest possible solutions and a practical approach.

With the minister heading the division within a department responsible to Parliament for its activities, the problems of the elderly could be given an administrative focus embracing all of the existing programs. In addition, there would be a framework for co-ordination with other departments such as Revenue Canada and Manpower and Immigration. The new division might also have its own policy and research branch.

By giving the proposed body full divisional status, the door would be opened to deal with the provincial and municipal levels of government in a forceful and effective way. Most importantly, the federal government can speak for all Canadians, and all Canadians are going to be involved. By setting up a division on aging, the federal government would be sending a clear signal to other levels of government that the time had come to mobilize their resources to meet the issue.

[Senator Croll.]

The question is often asked: What do our older people want? Let me answer it this way: They are not just looking for more money, although more would assuredly be welcome. They are not just looking for better food, or clothing, or shelter, desirable though such things would be. Our older people are looking for dignity and for respect. A general serenity coupled with self-respect is a requisite for personal happiness. There is no serenity and little self-respect available, when you are old and poor.

All human beings have the same basic needs, but personal values influence how we satisfy those needs. Abraham Maslow, a social psychologist, has developed a widely accepted theory that claims that needs are hierarchical, in the sense that there are priorities in how we regard them. While not the last word on the subject, it is, nevertheless, a useful working model. At the top priority level, Maslow puts self-fulfillment; next, self-esteem—recognition, respect, prestige and achievement; next, social needs—love, affection and belonging; then safety needs, physiological and psychological; and, finally, physiological needs—food, clothing, health and shelter.

Our seniors have made a real and significant contribution to the building of Canada, whatever their individual walks of life. It is not a matter of social rank or profession or occupation. Each one has contributed according to his or her ability and that should be recognized and acknowledged. Our older people are sick and tired of being looked on as second-class citizens. They want recognition and they are entitled to it.

We have before us a proposal to create a division on aging. I invite you to give the proposal early and earnest consideration. There is no thought in my mind of creating a philosophical barrier of segregation between older Canadians and all others. Youth and age are states of mind as well as physiological conditions, and we are going to need the input of Canadians of all ages to cope with the social changes that lie ahead. Through a division on aging, our society can marshal its knowledge and resources to deal with those changes. In the meantime, the calendar is relentlessly enlarging the issue every day. We cannot afford to procrastinate. Older people need what all of us need: dignity, money, proper medical services and the opportunity for useful work. The only inevitable losses of old age are physical. Our society inflicts the others. What the elderly need most of all is enough money to live decently and with dignity. Too many of them do not have it. So they are asking to be paid for work they have done through their lifetime, even if they are not doing it now. There is a need this country cannot disregard.

Honourable senators, I ask your support for the motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

WINTER OLYMPIC GAMES, 1984

GAETAN BOUCHER—FELICITATIONS ON WINNING GOLD MEDAL AND BRONZE MEDAL

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, on behalf of the Senate I should like to express our congratulations to Gaetan Boucher, a Canadian speed skater, who has won an Olympic bronze medal and an Olympic gold medal for Canada in the Winter Olympics.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I know Gaetan Boucher who is from the Quebec region and I want to join with the Acting Leader of the Government in congratulating him. We are really proud of Gaetan Boucher and we offer him our heartfelt congratulations.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 16, 1984, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 16, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to welcome our colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, who, we are delighted to see, is once again in the saddle, riding in front of his troops under the blue flag. Although I have often been a target for his arrows, I wish to emphasize the sincerity of my welcome and my pleasure in seeing him back in this Chamber, in good health.

[English]

If I may I will add one other thing which he probably already knows, and that is how well his deputy performed as acting leader in his absence and how he has, as usual, added to the respect and esteem in which this house holds him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, although I was not expecting a welcoming speech, I put a few words down on paper anyway!

[English]

Senator Frith: "I just happened to have my music."

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: I am not so sure this is going to last.

[English]

Honourable senators, I must admit that after an absence of more than four months I felt somewhat out of place when I entered the chamber, a few moments ago. However, after this warm welcome I want you to know that I feel much better. It is nice to be back and to be able to thank you all again for your many expressions of solicitude during my illness and convalescence. It was truly comforting to know that you cared enough to be concerned.

As I got better and stronger, less preoccupied with eternity and more with proximate future, I began to worry about my image in this place. You are definitely not supposed to say that you missed me, hope that I am regaining my strength, are pleased to see me back and look forward to picking on me anew. I am supposed to be the "picker"—not the "pickee".

I would like to thank especially Senators Roblin, Asselin and Macdonald for the fine work they did while I was away.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: What about us?

Senator Flynn: Of course, they were helped by everyone here, and even, I am told, occasionally by the Deputy Leader of the Government. In fact, they did so well that I will ask them to continue on for a while yet. I do not want to go too far at the beginning.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to take this opportunity to congratulate you on your appointment. As you know, approval of your appointment was unanimous. I was able to send you a message to that effect and to give you the assurance of my full co-operation and, of course, the co-operation of all Opposition Members.

I know you well enough to say that your competence, impartiality and dignity suit you admirably to the duties with which you have been entrusted.

[English]

To the more recent appointees to this chamber, I extend the hand of welcome. You will love it here—you probably already do. There is always something important to do—for instance, the discussion on reform of the Senate. You may have, in some instances, added new elements to that debate.

Last evening I saw Senator Olson, and I can tell you that he is on the mend. For once he chose to copy me, but I think he picked the wrong occasion. As you may know, he plans to be back at his job in March, at which time we have agreed to assure one another and all honourable senators that we are our old selves again.

[Translation]

Thank you again, all of you, for your kindness.

THE BUDGET SPEECH*PROPOSALS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, February 21, 1984, I will call the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on February 15, 1984.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE*ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 21, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Honourable senators, the plan for next week is to sit Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, to leave Wednesday open for caucus in the morning and for committee meetings in the afternoon, to resume on Thursday at 2 o'clock, and to adjourn until Tuesday, March 6, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The only thing that might interfere with that program is the matter of Bill C-18, which, apparently, is not a controversial piece of legislation.

Bill C-18 is entitled: "An Act to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves." The House of Commons had planned to deal with that bill towards the end of next week, which might have interfered with the plan that I have already announced of adjourning on February 23 until March 6; that announcement made on the basis of the adjournment of the House of Commons over that same period.

I have taken part in some conferences about this bill, including discussions with Senator Roblin, and it appears the House of Commons will endeavour to pass that bill this week. That will give us plenty of time to deal with it before the proposed adjournment. Therefore, while raising the potential problem, I do believe that it is settled and that we can plan to adjourn on Thursday next until Tuesday, March 6.

I believe that committee meetings next week will commence on Tuesday evening. I thought I had brought with me the list of committee meetings so as to be able to inform honourable senators more precisely, but I cannot locate it at the moment. I know that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has scheduled a meeting for Tuesday evening. Some committee meetings are to be held on Wednesday afternoon and others on Thursday morning. So we will be quite active next week.

Honourable senators, I ask support for the motion.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my honourable friend has made reference to Bill C-18. Perhaps it would be appropriate to say a word about that piece of legislation.

I, too, understand that, in all probability, the bill will be dealt with in the other place tomorrow, which is good news from our point of view. I would point out to my honourable friend, however, that this is a piece of enabling legislation. It enables some Indian bands in British Columbia to enter into agreements with the Province of British Columbia and the federal government in respect of what are called cut-off lands. I have satisfied myself by preliminary inquiries that the Government of British Columbia agrees with this bill. I assume that, if my honourable friend introduces it, he agrees with it. I would like to be assured. Perhaps the information as to whether the Indian bands concerned agree can be obtained before too long. That information is the missing factor in the equation. If we can have some satisfaction on that point, it seems to me that that bill should not detain us because, if all three parties concerned are agreed, we can deal with it in an expeditious fashion.

The other point I should like to make is that I hope my honourable friend can persuade some of our committees to meet on Wednesday afternoon next week. There was quite a crush this morning with three or four committees meeting at the same time, and that seems to be our bête noire around here. I would ask my honourable friend to try to space the committee meetings so that Wednesday afternoon of next week is put to good use.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will deal with the committee question first and then ask Senator Austin to respond to the question concerning Bill C-18.

The plan for next week, as it stands now, is that on Tuesday, after the Senate rises, the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will meet, and at 7 o'clock that evening the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will continue with its study on VIA Rail.

I am happy to be able to say that Wednesday is being well used next week, unlike, as Senator Roblin has pointed out, it was used this week. The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will meet at 2 p.m., and the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will also meet at 2 p.m. At 4 p.m. the Special Committee on National Defence will meet.

On Thursday the Special Committee on National Defence will meet in North Bay, and the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet in the morning. As usual, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration will meet at 11.15 on Thursday morning.

I would now invite Senator Austin to speak to the question concerning Bill C-18.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, in respect to the Indian cut-off lands issue—

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend should have spoken before the deputy leader because, if we are to pay any attention to the rules, the matter would be over, but I am not going to fuss about it.

Senator Austin: I am sorry; I don't understand the point.

Senator Roblin: The point is that, when my honourable friend spoke the second time on his motion he closed the debate, but you may go ahead.

Senator Frith: Unless we consider it responding to questions.

Senator Austin: I thought Senator Roblin was seeking information, and I rose after Senator Frith had spoken to give him that information. However, I do not want to abuse the rules.

Senator Frith: I should have proceeded in another way and let you go first.

Senator Austin: I simply want to assure the house that the Indian bands in question are very anxious to have that portion of the legislation which deals with the B.C. cut-off lands passed. There is a great history to that question, but the neat point at the moment is that, if the legislation is not passed by March 6, then the obligation of the parties, and particularly that of the Province of British Columbia, would also cease, and the matter would go back into limbo for renegotiation. Therefore, the Indian bands and the federal government are most anxious to conclude the agreement which requires the passage of that legislation.

Motion agreed to.

LITHUANIA

SIXTY-SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, since I was given the responsibility of implementing the federal government's policy of multiculturalism 11 years ago, I have come to know many Canadians and, in particular, Canadians who came to this country from Lithuania.

As honourable senators know, next Wednesday the Twelfth Baltic Night will be hosted by the parliamentary sponsoring committee composed of honourable senators and members of the House of Commons. There will be a musical program and banquet given by the Baltic Federation of Canada.

This gala is usually preceded by several events. It is fitting to note that today, February 16, 1984, is a great anniversary in the history of Lithuania. Canadians of Lithuanian origin as well as Lithuanians the world over are commemorating the sixty-sixth anniversary of the proclamation of the restoration of the independence of Lithuania.

The history of Lithuania is particularly rich in its defence of Christianity, its fierce love of patriotism and culture, and its heroic fight against the advances of the Teutonic knights.

● (1420)

In 1386, when the territories of Lithuania were almost as large as those of Poland and extended from the Baltic to the Black Sea, the Grand Duke Jogaila married the Polish Queen Hedwig d'Anjou. From that time on the two countries existed together in a commonwealth, and in 1569 the union was sealed by the Treaty of Lublin, a treaty of confederation which concluded that Poland and Lithuania should exist together as two states, having their own armies, their own lands, their own language, and their own customs and traditions. Subsequently, Lithuania was subjugated by the Russian Czarist regime, and, after regaining its independence in 1918, began to flourish, but enjoyed its freedom for only a short 21 years. We must remember that the Western powers and Canada promptly gave de jure recognition to the Baltic states, and they never at any time agreed to the de facto occupation of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia by force in June 1940.

Lithuania today is a country subjugated by the U.S.S.R. and its people are clammering for fundamental rights and human freedoms. Those rights were guaranteed by the United Nations Charter of Human Rights as well as by the principles of the Helsinki Final Act, which was signed by the U.S.S.R., by almost all of the European countries, and by Canada and the United States.

Today, on the occasion of the sixty-sixth anniversary of Lithuanian independence, we pay tribute to the human rights activists in Lithuania and all of the Lithuanian peoples who are yearning for the return of true freedom and democratic institutions. We also pay tribute to Canadians of Lithuanian ancestry who, since their arrival in this country before the First World War, have contributed greatly to the economic, cultural, social and intellectual development of Canada.

We should not lose hope, however, but and we should co-operate with Canadians of Lithuanian origin to help them preserve their cultural heritage—which, in fact, we do through the federal government's policy of multiculturalism and its entrenchment in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

There is also further hope in the near future, as from the Stockholm Disarmament Conference, which followed the Madrid Review meeting, as well as from the human rights experts' meeting which will take place in Canada in 1985. We hope there will develop a climate in which human rights and freedoms will again flourish in all countries.

WINTER OLYMPIC GAMES, 1984

GAÉTAN BOUCHER—FELICITATIONS ON WINNING A SECOND GOLD MEDAL

Hon. Philip Deane Gigantes: Honourable senators, a young Canadian from Quebec, Gaétan Boucher, has honoured his country today for a second time at the Winter Olympics. He has won the 1500-metre event in speed-skating, as he had won the 1000-metre event after winning the bronze medal in the 500-metre race. He is the first Canadian to win four medals at the Olympic Games; this young man has shown a really extraordinary willpower as well as an unequalled force of character and he is a credit to this country. I suggest that the Senate should congratulate him.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, probably no one has forgotten that we offered our congratulations for the bronze medal and the gold medal won by Gaétan Boucher last Tuesday or Monday. A third medal has now been added to these, and there may be a fourth one.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Hear, hear!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

INVESTIGATION OF LEADER OF PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rather imagine that the Acting Leader of the Government is anxious to have the opportunity to explain to us exactly what is involved in what is now known as Project Opwatch, which has to do with certain investigations undertaken with respect to certain members of Parliament by certain members of the administration. I would ask my honourable friend to give us that explanation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will probably have noted that in the other place the Deputy Prime Minister explained that what was alleged to be a covert operation turned out to be work done by a summer student in the library of the University of Ottawa, in obtaining publicly available material with respect to the Leader of the Opposition who had taken the position—and I would say quite rightly—that his career up to that time had qualified him for the job he had just undertaken.

There is very little I can add to what the Deputy Prime Minister said in the other place as to the nature of the so-called operation, except that it was what would seem to me would be considered normal activity by a political party, or the leadership of that party, in a legislature or Parliament to obtain information on parliamentarians, whether leading or otherwise.

Honourable senators will also remember that the Prime Minister's Office offered the opportunity to all journalists to go in and look at the material. In fact, if you were watching television you saw pictures of the journalists looking over the material to prove that it was public material and not covert.

On the other hand, I understand that the Progressive Conservative Party has today refused to allow reporters to see its files, assembled at taxpayers' expense, on Prime Minister Trudeau. The Progressive Conservative Party Research Director, Geoff Norquay, is quoted as saying:

All I can say is that they are private files; they are for us and us alone and that is that.

A reporter from the Canadian Press was initially granted permission to see the Conservative material which fills two drawers of a filing cabinet. Approximately half an hour later he was told that he would not be allowed to see one of the drawers, and at that time no explanation was given regarding the withdrawal of permission. Approximately fifteen minutes after that, access to the other drawer of material was denied, and the reporter was then asked to leave. Staffer Lynn Richardson referred all questions relating to the files to Mr. Norquay. Mr. Norquay would not say whether there was anything damaging in the files. He was quoted as saying:

I am not going to comment on that at all because that is none of your business. They are private files; they are files that belong to the Party.

—but files apparently gained at taxpayers' expense.

Honourable senators will remember that on Wednesday Conservative MPs were outraged about reports that government-paid staff in the Prime Minister's Office were used to investigate the background of Tory leader Brian Mulroney. As was pointed out, they called the investigation a "vain witch hunt"—although, apparently, they have been doing the same thing—and they demanded a public inquiry. The answers that were given were those that I have given today.

Mr. Norquay, apparently, would not say why he would not follow the Liberal example and allow reporters to view the material on Prime Minister Trudeau which is located in the PC library in a government-owned building near Parliament Hill. When asked if the files were assembled at taxpayers' expense, Norquay said, "Yes, they were, but they are private files."

The files include books, newspaper clippings and other publicly-available biographical material, most of it written since Prime Minister Trudeau took office in 1968, dealing with his tenure as Prime Minister.

However, some articles go back into Trudeau's past as a university professor and world traveller and some claim to prove Trudeau is a Communist. For example, there are seven copies of the U.S. Congressional Record for October 12, 1968, in which a Louisiana congressman quotes former Soviet embassy clerk, Igor Gouzenko—who defected to Canada in 1945—as saying there was a real possibility that Trudeau planned to turn Canada into "a second Cuba." There is also a reprint of a 1971 article in American Opinion Magazine entitled: "Canada—How the Communists took Control." The article says Trudeau headed a Communist delegation from Canada to a Moscow Economic Conference in 1952.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That was assembled by his opponents at the convention in 1968.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is the material that was gathered at the taxpayers' expense by the opposition leader's Conservative Party on Prime Minister Trudeau. All I can say is that, if we had that kind of material on Mr. Mulroney, as everyone knows, we would share it with the press—as we did; but in this case we find that, whereas what the Liberals have on Mr. Mulroney—which apparently falls into the same category, although it is less ample—is the subject of some sort of scandalous allegations, when the same material, gathered in the same way at taxpayers' expense by the Conservative Party, is asked for by the press, they are told that it is none of their damned business.

I thank the Honourable Senator Roblin for the occasion to comment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am sure that my honourable friend came loaded with what ammunition he had.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Next question?

Senator Roblin: One would expect that of him. I am interested in what he has said, because I have some more questions.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Oh, no!

Senator Roblin: Indeed, this distasteful little caper, which my honourable friend is attempting to justify, is presented to us in the other chamber as being a public operation, and my honourable friend has mentioned today that this is no covert situation, no secret society, but a public investigation. I will accept that for the time being as a statement of the government's position. That being so, I am sure that my honourable friend will be quite willing to provide me with some information about how this public operation was conducted. For example, I would like him to tell me something about the cast of characters who, according to reports, are involved in the activities of the Prime Minister's Office. Without wishing to labour the point, I find quite a difference between something that is carried out by the Prime Minister's Office and something that is carried out by another politician some place else.

I would like to know what part Mr. Axworthy had in this operation. He is the principal secretary to the Prime Minister and I presume that he has information he can give us as to what his instructions were or what his intentions were. I would like to know what Mr. Michael Gillan had to do with this matter. He is said to be the Prime Minister's political communications advisor. There is a certain Mr. William MacEachern, who is described as one who would "do normal work in terms of points to be raised and that sort of thing." That description was offered by one of the parties that had something to do with the matter. What does that statement mean? Then I would like to ask what Mr. David Crenna had to do with the matter. He is described as a social policy advisor. How does a social policy advisor get involved in this kind of operation? I would be interested to know. I would also be interested to know what Mr. Pierre Cadieux had to do with the matter, because Mr. Axworthy described his mandate, if I have the information correctly, as being concerned with the social implications of the mining industry. I am sure that that position takes in a great deal of territory, but I would like to know exactly what Mr. Cadieux's role was in investigating the social implications of the mining industry. I would like to know why, if it was the case, he was instructed to confine his investigations to the library of the University of Ottawa? Why, for example, did he have no recourse to the Parliamentary Library?

Those are matters an examination of which would be interesting.

There is a young lady—I presume she is a young lady; all ladies are young—by the name of Susan Angus also referred to as being involved in this activity. If this is a public examination, as it is alleged, I think we have some right to inquire into what these various people did. I should like to know what their terms of reference were and whether they were paid for this operation? If so, what was the remuneration?

In other words, it would, I think, clear the air and perhaps establish the bona fides of my honourable friend opposite—which he is so impatient to communicate to us this afternoon—if he would continue the job and give us the full information with respect to this incident so that members of the Senate and others could have an opportunity to judge and weigh the very firm statement made by the Deputy Prime Minister that this was a defensible operation in every respect—and maybe it was. So I think my honourable friend should produce the information that would convince us of that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I know that, consistent with Senator Roblin's reputation for fair play, he will surely subscribe to an even wider investigation and search for information than that which he is suggesting.

I suppose that, if what was done by the Prime Minister's Office was a "distasteful little caper", then what we have found the Conservative government has done would be an equally distasteful, but much larger, caper.

I do not consider what the Conservatives did was any more distasteful than what the Liberals did. In fact, I do not consider it distasteful at all, because I do not consider what the Liberal Party did or what the Prime Minister's Office did as being distasteful in any way; it was quite normal. That was done for a period of some 20 years, or at least 15 years, by the Conservative Party.

Why not have an exchange of information? Why not find out the role of the dramatis personae listed by Senator Roblin, and then perhaps he could speak to Mr. Norquay and ask him why, if the Liberals are prepared to share their information, the Conservatives are not, and what role Mr. Norquay played in obtaining the information that he refuses to share. Perhaps he could be asked what role other people might have played, who might have been in organizational positions since 1968. Perhaps Senator Murray had a role to play in that, and if he did, I would not criticize him for doing that.

I think honourable senators would consider it a fair exchange if, while I am searching for an explanation of the role of certain people in what I insist was not a covert, distasteful little caper, he would obtain more information on the Tory material, and also the roles of the various dramatis personae since 1968.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, Hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He would be the only one to agree with that.

Senator Roblin: Someone in the chamber likes what my honourable friend has said, but I do not. If my honourable friend wants to reveal information from the Liberal information bank with respect to the Conservative Party, we might have something to talk about. When he speaks about what is being done in the Prime Minister's Office, that is something quite different.

In view of the fact that the Deputy Prime Minister said in the other place that this was work performed in the interest of Canada, the least my honourable friend can do is reveal to this house the way in which this work performed for the benefit of Canada is being conducted, who is doing it and under what terms of reference.

If he wants to get into political files, I invite him to look at mine. I have one, and maybe he has one, too. He is free to look at mine. If he wants to open the bank of the Liberal Party files, as he suggested the bank of the Conservative Party files should be opened, there may be something to talk about.

I really want to get back to the point; it has to do with the information collected by the Prime Minister's Office.

● (1440)

I have another question which I think I could well ask my honourable friend: What other members of Parliament—I do not even say Progressive Conservative members—are under this public scrutiny by the Prime Minister's Office? Indeed, if there are none, is he able to give me the assurance that this sort of thing will cease, insofar as the Prime Minister's Office is concerned?

Regarding political party offices, I think we will have to agree that the amassing of information about personalities in the country will continue; but I would be very disturbed, indeed, if he were to tell me that the Prime Minister's office would continue this sort of operation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, all I can say is, "nice try." Let us get back to exactly what we were talking about. The question has been raised about activity undertaken by the Prime Minister's Office at taxpayers' expense to obtain information on the parliamentary leader of another political party. That is the allegation. I am not speaking about anything more than that, nor is Mr. Norquay. We are both talking about the same thing: that is, information gained and filed at taxpayers' expense—not separate party documents—on the leader of another party, namely, the Liberal Party. Again I say the information being asked for has already been shared publicly with the press.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Do you think anyone believes that?

Senator Frith: I have no difficulty in offering the same documents that were offered to the press. In the meantime, can we expect to hear from our friends opposite, who are so keen on letting the air in on this whole matter—it having already been let in through the open windows with the sun shining in on the Liberal side in a sense of fair play and equity—something different from Mr. Norquay? We can then set a time when friends opposite can, if they want to, come to view the same material that was shown to the press. Perhaps we can then go and view the same material that was established—not all party files, not my party files, not Senator Roblin's party files—for exactly the same purpose but covering a longer period of time and also at taxpayers' expense?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I can supply some information to the Acting Leader of the Government with respect to the material assembled on the Prime Minister's trip to Cuba and so on and so forth. I remember very clearly that this material was assembled by his opponents in the leadership campaign of 1968. I am quite sure that if he questioned some of them—and I will not name them, although I know some of them—he would find out everything he wants to know. At that time it was also public knowledge.

Senator Frith: That is most interesting. What the Liberal Party has simply said is, "Here are the documents; come and see them. Make up your own mind whether there is anything here that has been obtained in a covert way." However, when we ask for the same thing from the Conservative Party, we are to ask the question of leaders or of people contending for the leadership of the Liberal Party. The analogy is right. No matter how much my friends try to escape the analogy, it is a sound one. We have yet to hear why there was anything covert about the material that was obtained by the Liberals. I am sure there was nothing covert about the material obtained by the other side. One way to convince the people of Canada that the Conservative Party is interested in fairness and equity with respect to this kind of situation is for them to tell Mr. Norquay to follow the Liberal example.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Acting Leader of the Government has referred to the opposition research office. There is a comparable parliamentary office on the other side, which is a parliamentary research office for the Liberal caucus. However, Project Opwatch is not being conducted by the research office of the Liberal Party caucus. A special contract was entered into, not by the parliamentary research office of the Liberal caucus, but by the Office of the Prime Minister. One of the people with whom the contract was entered into was Mr. Cadieux, who was told that he had to keep his work very quiet and very secret. I quote from the Globe and Mail:

An official involved in Opwatch said the PMO was so concerned about keeping Mr. Cadieux's activities quiet that he was not even allowed to use the parliamentary library, where he would have had to register his name.

Can the Acting Leader of the Government explain why this project was entered into not by the comparable Liberal parliamentary office but, rather, by the Office of the Prime Minister? At the same time, can he tell us what the Prime Minister's Office is doing snooping into title searches for Mr. Mulroney's house in Montreal?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, of course we will never know whether—

Senator Murray: I guess we won't.

Senator Frith: We will never know whether exactly the same activity was undertaken by the Progressive Conservative Party and by the people who are claiming there is something awry until we see what the results of it were. It is this simple: If the Grits do it, it is scandalous; if the Tories do it, then it is none of our business and it is not scandalous.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if my honourable friend would care to deal with the question of why it was considered necessary to search the titles of Mr. Mulroney's house in Montreal. What public purpose is served by that activity?

Senator Frith: Perhaps, when we see what was done by the Conservatives, we can also find out why it was necessary to obtain that information. The point is that we cannot obtain any admission that will say, "Here is the material; this is what we obtained; it is there; you can come to your own conclusions—the press, the people of Canada, or anyone else." We cannot obtain that information from the Conservatives, which is why it is very difficult to take their scandalized questions as very sincere, or even to take them seriously at all.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend may have taken note of the fact that I did not lay any scandalous charges; others may have, but I have been careful to confine myself to an appreciation of the government's position that this is a public activity in the interests of the state—not in the interests of a political party.

[Senator Frith.]

It seems to me that there is a fundamental difference between the two types of information being gathered here. The information gathered by the Conservative political office or by the Liberal political office is for party purposes; we understand that and we say that that is part of the system. However, we are being told here and in the other place that the investigation by the Prime Minister's Office was not a political investigation, but was done in order to advance the public interest.

I ask my honourable friend: What was the purpose of the investigation by the Prime Minister's office? How does my friend reconcile the statement of the Deputy Prime Minister in the other place that this was in the interests of the public service of Canada and not of a political party? The Deputy Prime Minister did not allege that this was in the interests of the Liberal Party; he said it was in the interests of the state. That is the fundamental distinction between the two types of information gathering activities my honourable friend is referring to. I want him to tell us how the investigation of Mr. Mulroney's activities by the Prime Minister's Office is of service to the public of Canada.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not going to try to reconcile anything. I say very clearly that in my opinion—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: You cannot reconcile anything.

Senator Frith: Someone else can reconcile what I say with something else. I am saying that in my opinion the Prime Minister's Office has a clear political role, as does the Office of the Leader of the Opposition and as does the Office of the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Senator Donahoe: That is the first admission we have had.

Senator Frith: It is not made up of public servants; it is made up of political advisers. Their role is one they exercised in this case. I assume the same role was exercised in the case of the Tory files that they do not want to share with respect to Prime Minister Trudeau. I am not suggesting for a moment that this was not the work of a political party, as was the work of the Conservative Party. I happen to be a person who thinks that partisan political activity is in the public interest. A great many people have had their heads blown off—have died for the possibility of having a country built on political parties.

The Prime Minister has recently returned from a place where you can live if you do not want partisan political activity—they have only one party there.

• (1450)

Senator Flynn: He enjoys it there.

Senator Frith: What the Prime Minister's Office did was legitimate activity by the leadership of a political party. I am sure that the activity the Conservative Party admits it has undertaken, insofar as the leadership of the Liberal Party is concerned since 1968, was equally legitimate. That is why the analogy is exact, and why it is still hard to understand why there is any sense of shock on the part of the opposition at what took place, when it was exactly the same sort of thing that they were also quite legitimately doing.

Senator Roblin: I will try once again. I will try once again to convince my honourable friend that there is a difference between party political activities by political parties, which is what the Conservatives have been doing and what the Liberals have been doing—

Senator Frith: No, no!

Senator Roblin: —and party political activity on the part of—

Senator Frith: This is in the Leader of the Opposition's Office.

Senator Roblin: So what?

Senator Frith: It is the same thing.

Senator Roblin: It is not the same thing. The Liberal Party has the same source of funds as the Leader of the Opposition's Office has, and they have their political role to fill. We are talking about an activity by the Prime Minister's Office that is represented to us as an activity in the public interest and not in a party's interest. That is why we say we need more information about it.

I want my honourable friend to re-examine this matter and to admit to himself that the operation in the Prime Minister's Office was allegedly in the public interest, and that we have a legitimate right to ask for the information we are seeking. What was the purpose of that activity that would justify its description as an activity in the public interest rather than a partisan one?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will try once again. The activity was political activity by the political part of the Prime Minister's Office, just as the Conservative leader's activity was political activity.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: By a politician!

Senator Frith: Are we going to debate the question of whether the information obtained on Prime Minister Trudeau was in the public interest? I have said why it is in the public interest. Both of them are in the public interest because they are both absolutely legitimate political activity, and party politics is a part of our system, thank God.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have one final question for the Acting Leader of the Government on this matter. Can he explain to us why there is this thirst for knowledge about Brian Mulroney, when their information was so deficient in the case of Roger Simmons? Why could they not have employed all these industrious young men and women to look into Roger Simmons' background?

An Hon. Senator: Cheap! Cheap!

Senator Frith: I hear the adjective "cheap", but, of course, I cannot associate myself with that. I choose to say that I will only give that kind of rhetorical answer to such a rhetorical question.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is dodging the issue as to whether the activities of the Prime Minister's Office, which are advertised to us in the other place as being in the public interest, are such that we should be entitled to be given the information we seek. Again, I ask him to do that. If he does not do that, the only conclusion to be drawn is that the purpose of the activity was not in the public interest. The purpose of the activity was to discredit the Leader of the Opposition. That is why it was being done.

Senator Frith: Unlike the material that you gathered about Mr. Trudeau.

An Hon. Senator: That information came from your people.

An Hon. Senator: Do it from party influence.

Senator Roblin: Parties can do what they like. Parties can do what they like.

Senator Frith: No, no.

Senator Flynn: I was there in 1968, but you were not.

Senator Roblin: The claim made in the other place is that it was in the public service of the country that this was being done. If it was not to discredit Mr. Mulroney, what was the purpose of the operation?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have made it very clear: I do not care what was said in the other place.

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Frith: I am responsible for answering questions here. I have not dodged the issue.

Senator Flynn: Not much!

Senator Frith: I have said that it was in the public interest because it was in the interests of partisan politics, which I consider worthwhile activity, and was as justified by the opposition as it is by the government party. That is clear and I am not dodging that issue. I am facing that issue. That is how it is, and what somebody said in the other place is their business.

Senator Roblin: There is at least one thing about my honourable friend that I admire and that is his frankness, because he has underlined what is an obvious characteristic of this present administration. They have quite forgotten how to distinguish between the public interest and their own political interest.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: One can find this theme running through the activities of this government from stem to stern—how they have abused the public service as part of their political machine in so many different ways. If ever there was any evidence that it is time to reverse this process by putting some new people in charge, we have it now. I say to my honourable friend that he leaves me unsatisfied. He has not faced up to the problem that I put before him, and, therefore, I repeat my request for more information.

Senator Frith: There is a certain mutuality in that, because I find myself unsatisfied by the responses and the questions of the other side. I am tempted to use the allegory of the pot calling the kettle black, but since I do not think either are black—

Senator Flynn: Hah!

Senator Frith: In other words, I do not criticize the Conservatives for doing what they did, but I do criticize them for not being prepared to share it. I say that what both parties did was legitimate activity, and I will leave it at that.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Let us revert to the business of the nation.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend want to contribute to this discussion? What was it he said?

Senator Langlois: Let us revert to the business of the nation.

Senator Roblin: It is the business of the nation when the Prime Minister's Office is investigating the character, the personality and the background of the Leader of the Opposition. If that is not the business of the nation, I do not know what is. This is another example of the insensitivity of my friends on the other side. I do not say that not all parties do collect political information about their opponents. Of course they do. No question about that.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Roblin: It is a question of who does the asking and who does the collecting. When you have the Prime Minister's Office saying it is in the public interest that they should be investigating the Leader of the Opposition—and not just his public affairs, because I do not see how the mortgage on his house in Westmount could be considered part of the public domain and interest, for that is a personal matter; at least I am sufficiently old fashioned enough to think that it is—it seems to me that the position of the government is well exposed, and I am quite willing to leave the arbitrament of this issue to the electorate the next time we get a chance.

Senator Frith: I want it to be clear that I understand with Senator Roblin that this is all public interest. I underline the fact that what the Tories have been doing and what the Liberals are doing are proper parts of political activity.

Senator Flynn: Broken activity!

Senator Frith: We do not know if there is any mortgage material or anything of that kind in the Conservatives' files, because they won't let us see it. That is their privilege. I agree with them that it is a matter of public interest for exactly the reasons I mentioned. I do not wish Senator Roblin or anyone else to think that it was improper of him to raise it, because the fact is that both parties have been engaged in legitimate political activity and that, in my view, is always in the interest of the public.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his kind permission to raise the topic, because I assure him that I am not the only one who is interested in it.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Frith: I did not give you permission to raise it. I said that I did not criticize you for doing it.

Senator Roblin: Well, that is very generous of you. I appreciate that kind sentiment.

Senator Frith: It is just a fact.

Senator Roblin: Oh, it is just a fact. That is very good. I wish there were a few more facts from my honourable friend. My problem is that he does not give me the facts.

Senator Frith: Neither do you.

Senator Roblin: He deals with the whole issue, dodges it very cleverly and very effectively, but does not give us the facts.

Senator Frith: We will see, when we read the transcript, who is the more artful of the dodgers.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Now you win.

Senator Roblin: Hands down. I concede.

Senator Frith: We are giving matching awards on this side.

Hon. Philip Deane Gigantes: Honourable senators, for the following reasons I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government to persist in his questions and not to give up on this: When I was director of communications of the Liberal Party, a colleague of mine from journalistic days was occupying a similar position with the Conservative Party. As old friends do, we used to meet and have a drink and say to one another that some of the ammunition we threw at one another was akin to people in the nineteenth century being shocked at seeing the ankle of a lady. I suggest that that is a little of what we do here, because it is fairly similar from one side to the other. I remember his telling me quite clearly that what he had in his files on Mr. Trudeau was pretty sick stuff which he, himself, would never have used but which people in his party wanted to use and kept sending in. He said that it was the sort of thing that he would be ashamed to show.

• (1500)

I am asking the Deputy Leader of the Government to keep insisting on this so that the shame of what is in those files should come out.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I should like to suggest to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that he revert to his first supplementary question, in which he posed a challenge, as Deputy Leader of the Opposition, to the Acting Leader of the Government. In that challenge he proposed that they have an exchange or make some comparisons. I am going to suggest that, by way of stopping this exchange in mid-air, because it can go on all afternoon, we have a contest, and that we call it the "You Show Me Yours and I'll Show You Mine" contest. I think that would be a satisfactory way to resolve the whole matter.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear!

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DECEASED VETERANS—WIDOWS' PENSIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government having to do with the budget proposals and an action plan for pension reform.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: Although there are many items proposed in the budget, I wonder why there still exists such an anomaly with respect to the veterans legislation having to do with widows' allowances. There is, at present, great variation and discrimination as between different classes of disability pensions. By way of example, a married veteran who is receiving the 50 per cent disability pension receives some $678 per month. When that veteran dies, his wife receives an increase of $135, which is fair because it allows her to adjust to the changes in her lifestyle. On the other hand, a married veteran who is receiving the 100 per cent disability pension receives $1,378 per month. Upon his death, his widow loses $500 of that pension.

Honourable senators, I raised this question on January 31 and on numerous occasions before that. I am surprised to note that there are no proposals to amend the veterans' legislation to allow these pensions to be handled on a more equitable basis. I wonder whether the deputy leader would urge the Minister of Veterans Affairs not only to answer the question I posed on January 31 but to give us a statement as to why, at this late stage in the lives of veterans, this anomaly is not being corrected.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall try to get an answer to the question that was put earlier. I remember its being asked. I shall also urge that attention be given to the last point raised by Senator Marshall.

I want to add that in "Budget in brief" it is noted that:

Extensive consultations have now become a permanent feature of budget making in Canada and a number of major proposals have benefited considerably from the expertise and knowledge that was brought to bear on them in consultation and comment.

This budget continues the move to a more open and consultative process.

I remember that in the other place the Minister of Finance said that he wanted input from Canadians on particular aspects of the budget and on the ways in which such measures could be improved. I shall certainly pass on the request of Senator Marshall in the context of the minister's invitation to receive that kind of input.

Senator Marshall: In "Budget in brief" it is suggested that about a dozen areas be examined because of the possible need for change. Reference is made to the Canada Pension Plan, for example, which is to be strengthened to improve benefits to women.

Senator Frith: Are you referring to page 9 of "Budget in brief"?

Senator Marshall: This appears at page 10. I can go back to page 9, where it states that measures will be taken "to ensure that elderly Canadians receive pensions that are sufficient to allow them to live in comfort and dignity." That is fine, but it seems to me that various groups who are supposed to be representing the status of women are forgetting the very people they are supporting. It appears as though none of those groups even knows about this situation. I am sure that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is aware of it, because I have discussed it with him.

Honourable senators, the World War I veterans are now 83 or 84 years of age. They do not have much longer. In some cases, their wives will be losing up to $500 a month, and they cannot adjust to the shock and the drastic changes to their lifestyles. It is imperative that something be done about this. If we in the Senate could take any action in this regard, we would be doing a great service for Canadians.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX EVASION—PUBLICATION OF LIST—TASK FORCE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. On February 7 he responded to a question I had raised with respect to the publication of the names of innocent people who had undergone criminal prosecutions on charges of tax evasion under the Income Tax Act. He indicated that there is a special task force within the department's information division which will review such procedures.

Could the deputy leader ascertain for us when this task force is to commence its work? More specifically, could he find out when it is to conclude its work and make a report? I am also interested in knowing whether the findings of the task force will be made public.

I have another question that I trust is proper and it has to do with the composition of the task force. I am not so much interested in knowing the names of those on the task force as in knowing the professional backgrounds of those people. Is anyone with some legal background involved in the task force? I ask this question because, frankly, we are here involved in the question of mixing the innocent with the guilty. Someone with legal background or some knowledge of how our court and judicial system works should, in my view, have some input into such a task force.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that the question is quite reasonable and I shall try to obtain that information. It might be out of line for me to say this, but since Senator Nurgitz and I share an interest in this question, might I suggest that we ask whether we can be assured that they are going to look at this particular problem—we do not really have that precise assurance—after which we could inquire about the expertise they have to do so?

DISARMAMENT

PRIME MINISTER'S INITIATIVE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. The Prime Minister has just returned from Moscow, where he attended the funeral of General Secretary Andropov. I understand from reports in the media that he also had a meeting with General Secretary Chernenko. I wonder whether the deputy leader has any news concerning the latest effort on the part of the Prime Minister to promote a dialogue on disarmament.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question on the same subject put by Senator Asselin on February 14. Perhaps I can furnish that information now, by way of reply to Senator Bosa's question, because it does relate directly to the subject.

At their meeting in Moscow on February 15, the Prime Minister and Soviet General Secretary Chernenko primarily discussed east-west relations and the Prime Minister's initiative. The Prime Minister elaborated on some of the basic elements of his initiative and stressed the "window of opportunity" which would present itself over the next few months to take positive steps to improve east-west relations on several fronts. General Secretary Chernenko described the Prime Minister's initiative as useful and practical and encouraged its continuation. He spoke of the importance of political dialogue and détente.

The Prime Minister has said that this meeting with Chernenko—and this is directly related to Senator Asselin's question—"completes one cycle" of the initiative.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—PROPOSED MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government. I notice that he was heavily briefed for Senator Roblin's first question but was less so for subsequent questions. In this case, since it is in the realm of External Affairs, he may be thrice briefed because we are one of the countries in the world that has three foreign ministers.

Could the deputy leader tell us whether he has any information about the suggestion by France that a United Nations force may conceivably be introduced into the very grave Lebanese situation? What is the attitude of the Canadian government towards participation in any such force? He might also tell us whether the Prime Minister, in his discussions in Moscow, elicited from that member of the Security Council whether it supports the French initiative.

• (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had anticipated Senator Macquarrie's interest in these matters. I do have a briefing on the subject, which is in French, so perhaps the senator would switch to the translation. My information is as follows:

[Senator Frith.]

[Translation]

The Canadian government is aware of the fact that UN Security Council member nations are now discussing the possibility of replacing the multinational contingent by a UN force. However, Canada has not been approached about participating in that force.

If it were approached, Canada—mindful of the difficult local conditions—would be prepared to consider the possibility of joining a peacekeeping force in Lebanon if it were likely to make a worthwhile contribution to national stabilization and reconciliation in Lebanon, although such aims depend upon the Lebanese themselves and the other parties involved.

Still, a number of conditions should be met, including the most important, as follows:

- (a) the proposed force ought to be sponsored by the UN—neutral and impartial—and hold a clear and adequate mandate so as to be able to meet the duties assigned to it;
- (b) all parties involved should accept the deployment of that force and of its participants;
- (c) the parties involved should agree to maintain the cease-fire, and there should be serious and reasonable hope for reconciliation among the various factions after the force has been deployed;
- (d) UN member nations as a whole should guarantee the financing of such a force rather than rely on voluntary contributions.

Such a force does appear hypothetical, however, until such time as the positions of the parties involved and the situation in the field are clarified, and until UN Security Council member nations agree in principle on the establishment of a UN force.

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a general situation report on Lebanon as of 11 o'clock today, which reads as follows:

As opposition factions continue to press their military advantage, President Gemayel is reported to have accepted a Saudi peace plan which includes abrogation of the May 17 agreement.

Druze militia consolidated their victory over the Lebanese Armed Forces south of Beirut by occupying on Wednesday Damour and the former Phalange headquarters at Meshref in the southern Shouf mountains. The LAF's 4th Brigade, heretofore considered the Army's crack unit, is now completely surrounded by hostile militia south of Damour. Hundreds of disarmed LAF soldiers have fled southward to Israeli-held territory south of the Awali River. However, the last LAF stronghold in the Shouf mountains, Souk-el-Gharb, withstood a Druze attack Wednesday.

The Israeli Defense Forces are patrolling as usual the coastal road north of Sidon. Israeli and other sources report Palestinians of Abu Moussa's dissident Fatah group participated in the Druze-led attack on LAF troops yesterday. Israeli Defense Minister Arens said yesterday Lebanon now has no choice but to remain in southern Lebanon to ensure the security of Israel's north. In the last two days, an estimated 14,000 mostly Christian refugees have fled south towards Sidon.

Wednesday's Druze advances give Gemayel's opposition control of all of West Beirut and its southern suburbs, and a wide corridor extending east through the Shouf mountains to Aley and beyond to the Syrian-controlled Bekaa valley. As well, the US-MNF contingent at Beirut's International Airport is surrounded by opposition militias—only access to the sea remains open. No U.S. artillery or air support has been used in support of LAF troops for 24 hours.

An expectant calm prevails in Beirut, with only sporadic firing across the Green Line. The Druze and Shi'ite Amal militias indicated Wednesday their intention to establish a joint military command to administer areas of Beirut under their control. West Beirut TV, silent for 10 days and now controlled by Moslem militias, began broadcasting Thursday, pledging to present all views but excluding attacks on government institutions including the Presidency.

President Gemayel may announce tonight his "historic decision," widely believed to be his willingness to abrogate the May 17 agreement. Abrogation of the accord with Israel is one item of an eight-point peace plan proposed by the Saudis which Gemayel has apparently accepted. The plan also includes replacement of the MNF by UN troops, and withdrawal of Syrian and Israeli forces. The Saudi mediator and MFA, Prince al-Faisal, is to seek Syrian President Assad's agreement Thursday in Damascus.

Despite U.S.A. Secretary of State Shultz' strong verbal support for the May 17 pact on Wednesday, other Administration spokesmen suggest U.S. support for Gemayel would not be affected if he abrogates the pact. Israel's position is adamant: If the pact is abrogated, Israel would reserve its right to take unilateral action in southern Lebanon.

At the UN, the French proposal to replace MNF troops with UN forces is unlikely to win Security Council support.

Ambassador Jackson reports Canadian embassy staff are safe and that there have been no reported incidents involving Canadian citizens.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session—(Honourable Senator Côtteau).

Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau: Honourable senators, with leave I should like to yield to Senator Bielish.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I should first like to say how happy I am to see Senator Flynn, our leader, in the chamber today. He added a nice touch but I hope that he does not immediately start to work too hard. Yesterday I also saw Senator Olson, and he looked very well. I wish both senators good care and a speedy recovery to good health.

• (1520)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bielish: I should like to extend congratulations and a welcome to the newly appointed senators. I trust that we shall all work together for the betterment of our beloved country.

To Senator Bosa, I extend my warmest congratulations on his speech on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. His many interests and achievements, and his dedication to the ethnic and regional diversities in this country and to multiculturalism, are recognized and appreciated.

I could easily identify with Senator Hébert, who explained that he had never been a member of Parliament, a cabinet minister or even a premier. With all due respect to those honourable senators who may fall into the foregoing category, Senator Hébert demonstrated an insight into a wide range of topics, including youth, volunteerism, concern for developing countries, and world peace. I congratulate him on his thoughtful presentation and look forward with interest to his further contributions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bielish: I come now to the Speech from the Throne. I approached it as a representative of my region, the West, Alberta and Lakeland, and as a Canadian. The Speech contained five main goals: helping those who need help most; energy security at a fair price; promoting economic development; strengthening national institutions and contributing to national unity; and pursuing a vigorous foreign policy. Those are all noble objectives. No one could object to any of them.

Also contained in the Speech from the Throne are long accounts of achievements and more lists of promises. At that point I asked myself, "Is no one in this government going to face reality?"

The debate commenced almost at the time of delivery of the Speech, and included politicians, the news media and citizens and others across this country.

In a special to Grainews, dated December 1983, Charles Lynch, in an article entitled "Throne speech mostly fiction", says:

In this age of egomania, we all try to make ourselves look good, but Pierre Trudeau has gone too far in claiming greatness for his Long Parliament.

Later he says:

The speech spoke of the magnitude of his impact, the boldness of his initiatives, which had transformed the nation. For the better, the man means.

We must have been covering a different parliament and a different government in the last four years.

The one I've been watching featured the weakest of Trudeau's four cabinets, and the most chaotic scenes ever witnessed on the floor of the House of Commons.

The economy was and is in tatters, unemployment lingers at record highs and the deficit remains beyond measure.

The West was estranged, and the rest of the country bewildered.

Further on he says:

The speech boasts that the government has held the line on payroll and other expenditures, yet this is the same government that ballooned the business of big government and saddled the country with the most unmanageable deficits in history, with no hope of relief for the public treasury or those who have to manage it in future.

Trudeau keeps boasting that, at the start of his fourth and final mandate, he raised the Guaranteed Income Supplement to the Old Age Security Pension by $35 per month per household, "thereby improving the standard of living of 1.3 million pensioners".

As a homemaker, who has often had to go to the marketplace, I know how much the sum of $35 can purchase, in terms of today's dollar value, and it is not for one person only but per household.

Coming closer to home, let us look at what has happened to western farmers over the past few years, and what is ahead in light of the legislation forced upon them in recent times. Farmers faced input cost increases of from 300 per cent to 400 per cent over a period of 10 years. Commodity prices available to farmers have fallen to a level equivalent to 1972-73. Fuel costs doubled in two and a half years. Prairie farm incomes declined 29 per cent in 1982. Farmers have faced a 400 per cent to 500 per cent increase in interest rates. In the past 10 years, when we compare ourselves to the country south of the border and with other countries, we find that the average subsidy received by American wheat farmers was $11.41 per tonne, compared to $19.96 in the European Economic Community and $6.35 in Canada.

[Senator Bielish.]

In the 1982-83 crop year the federal subsidy to Canadian wheat farmers amounted to 37 cents per bushel, compared to $1.12 in the U.S.A. The safety net, as established by Bill C-155 to protect farmers in the event that prices were to fall drastically, is far too high ever to be triggered.

I refer honourable senators to an article by Barry Wilson which appeared in the Western Producer on January 26 last. The heading is "488 go bankrupt, others sink quietly". He writes:

A post-Depression record number of farmers went bankrupt last year . . .

The consumer and corporate affairs department reports that in 1983, 488 Canadian farmers declared bankruptcy, a 19 percent increase over the 1982 level.

On the Prairies, bankruptcies jumped 97 percent above 1982 levels to 154.

Hardest hit was Manitoba with 62 bankruptcies . . . followed by Alberta with 47 . . . and Saskatchewan with 45 . . .

In British Columbia, bankruptcies numbered 26. There were five the year before.

Further on he writes:

A spokesman for the Canadian Federation of Agriculture predicts that farm bankruptcy numbers will continue to be high this year, particularly on the Prairies.

And that is the region of Canada that I am speaking of.

• (1530)

On the subject of the National Energy Program, one really does not know where to start. I think every member of this chamber knows that Alberta has been devastated by the National Energy Program. The Financial Post editorial of July 23, 1983 argued that most if not all PIP-funded frontier drilling would have been considered uneconomical for Canadian companies without government support. Between January 1, 1981 and March 31, 1983, $1.4 billion in PIP grants was given to the petroleum industry. In reply to a question as to whether Husky Oil—which already has spent $1 billion, $800 million of which was supplied by Ottawa—would have been active in the frontiers without PIP, President Robert Blair said:

The answer is no. Husky would not have had the cash flow from other activities in western Canada. We were encouraged, stimulated and facilitated by the grants.

And so it goes.

According to the Globe and Mail of June 25, 1983, $30 million is being spent to convert BP to Petro-Canada stations. Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry stood at 18.7 per cent in 1980. It reached 25.9 per cent in 1981, and 26.2 per cent in 1982. However, the Financial Times editorial of August 1, 1983 noted that the companies making up the 26.2 per cent are wallowing in debt, losing money, paying huge interest charges and dipping into retained earnings to pay dividends.

One could go on and on. I shall make it shorter by simply referring to the Alberta Report of February 13, 1984. In the Resources section of that magazine, there is an article headed "Ottawa's self-sufficiency pipedream—PIP grants won't make it happen, two federal studies show," which reads as follows:

A major objective of Ottawa's National Energy Program, unveiled in October 1980, was the achievement of oil self-sufficiency in Canada by 1990. At the time it seemed a reasonable goal. The mammoth multi-billion-dollar Alsands and Cold Lake tar sands plants were being planned in northeast Alberta, while frontier production from the Beaufort Sea and East Coast looked promising. Moreover, oil prices were expected to continue rising much faster than inflation. However, a study prepared by the market analysis and statistics division of the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has concluded that self-sufficiency by 1990 is little more than a pipedream. Equally gloomy is the so-called 'blue book' published by the Geological Survey of Canada, another division of the federal government. While the GSC report concludes that the frontier regions may contain substantial reserves, it foresees only a trickle of that oil reaching Canadian markets by the end of the decade.

The EMR report, prepared last summer for internal departmental use only, is entitled Long Term Energy Supply Demand Outlook Summer '83 Forecast. It remained a confidential document until published late last month by the Calgary Herald. A senior Energy Department official maintains the study is part of an ongoing examination of crude oil supply and demand, and may already be out-dated. The document presents two world oil price scenarios, the first of which is considered more realistic. Prices likely will increase 2% faster than the annual rate of inflation from 1986 to 1990 and 1% per year until the year 2000. Less likely, says the department, are annual increases 3% above the inflation rate throughout the 14-year period.

So already the government's own reports are acknowledging the fact that their efforts and their actions are not living up to their expectations.

Further on in the same article on resources, there is a quote from Paul Gagnon, president of Joli Fou Petroleums, as follows:

Before the NEP was brought down we would have had two heavy oil plants in Alberta.

The article then continues:

The Alsands and Cold Lake plants would have turned out 250,000 b/d, but both collapsed in 1982.

Indeed, Ottawa's Petroleum Incentive Program (PIP) grants, which were part of the NEP and pay up to 80% of frontier exploration costs, are siphoning funds that might be used to develop the Alberta oil sands. Calgary energy analyst Paul Ziff has produced a study showing exploration and development expenditures in the West had dropped $800 million to $1.9 billion by 1982 while frontier spending rose $507 million to $1.6 billion.

The article ends by again quoting Mr. Gagnon as saying:

But you don't ignore heavy oil and tar sands deposits that you know are already there.

In other words, why spend money on exploration and deny aid to something that we already know is there? The chart attached to the article is also interesting and shows what has happened to that region of the west. Coming from that region as I do, I have to ask myself the question: Does anyone really care?

In welcoming the senators who have recently been appointed, I would like to draw the attention of this chamber to the fact that only two of them are women. Although this government subscribes to the doctrine of equality of status for women, I would point out that the current representation in the Senate does not reflect that doctrine because 52 per cent of the population of Canada is female. In the past, the excuse given for this imbalance was that not enough qualified women were available. The female senators who sat in this chamber in the past amply demonstrated their sufficiency of qualification, and it is clear that there are numerous persons in the professions and industry who are now sufficiently qualified to assume this role.

In order to make my point, I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to a report entitled As Things Stand, produced by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I commend the council for the tremendous amount of work it has put into its research on its reports, both those they have undertaken themselves and those they have had commissioned. This report contains some very interesting facts presented very succinctly. The beginning of the report documents the beginnings of the advisory council. It reads:

• (1540)

In many ways, we can date the beginning of the feminist movement in Canada by the establishment of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women on February 16, 1967. The Commission had a rather sweeping mandate, "to inquire into and report upon the status of women in Canada, and to recommend what steps might be taken by the federal government to ensure for women equal opportunities with men in all aspects of Canadian society..." The Commission submitted its report, which represented the most exhaustive study of the position of women in Canada to date, on September 28, 1970, to the Governor General in Council.

I am sure that we are all aware that the chairman of that commission was the Honourable Florence Bird, who retired from the Senate about a year ago. The report goes on to say:

The Royal Commission made 167 recommendations, of which the 166th recommended that a federal Status of Women Council be set up which would be directly responsible to Parliament and monitor annually the status of women, undertake research relevant to the status of women, establish programmes to correct attitudes and prejudices adversely affecting women, and propose legislation and policies in consultation with other government organizations and voluntary groups.

On May 31, 1973, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women was created.

And here I point out to honourable senators the distinction between the recommendations and the Council's mandate. The report continues:

Its functions are: "a) to bring before government and the public matters of interest and concern to women; and b) to advise the Minister (Responsible for the Status of Women) on such matters relating to the status of women as the Minister may refer to the Council or as the Council may deem appropriate. To fulfil these functions, the Council may publish its findings and recommendations."

The difference between the recommendations and the Council's mandate is that it reports to the minister responsible for the status of women, not directly to Parliament.

The report goes on to give an evaluation of what has happened in this area over the past ten years, so it involves more than one Parliament. I should point out to Senator Marshall that pensions for elderly women put them in the classification of the poorest of the poor. The evaluation assesses the direction and importance of changes affecting the position of women through a system of pluses and minuses. Surprisingly, after 10 years there are 10 areas in which the council gives a zero rating because there has been absolutely no advancement in the situation at all. There are several areas that receive a plus because some little thing has happened. The area of sports received a plus. The only topic that received the maximum of three pluses in the evaluation is the Constitution. Although the Council appears happy about the Constitution, I do not know whether the relevant parts in it really mean all that much yet; so those three pluses will have to be monitored carefully. Child care received a zero. Unemployment for women received a zero. Occupational health and safety is still at zero. The categories of part time work and divorce support and custody received zeros, and on it goes.

If we really believe in equality for women and if the government really meant what it said in the Throne Speech about this being an area in which it can do more work—

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: We are getting there. We have just appointed a woman as Governor General, and she was the first woman to be Speaker of the House of Commons.

Senator Bielish: The honourable senator is quite right; there are some pluses in this area. The report recognizes that a woman has been appointed the Speaker of the House of Commons, two women have been appointed Speaker of the Senate, a woman has been appointed to the Supreme Court bench and one or two women have been appointed judges in the provincial courts.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): And one of them is a chief justice.

Hon. Jack Marshall: The last lady speaker was the best we have had and she is sitting in the Chair now.

Senator Bielish: I acknowledge that. She is always here when she is needed.

Another area dealt with in the report is volunteerism, which received a zero. If somehow the work of volunteers of this nation could be summed up in hours of work and put in the GNP, it would be quite an eye opener and certainly worthy of consideration. I have been a volunteer myself and I know the amount of work volunteers put into the life-blood of Canada, often in areas where there is no one to do the work but the volunteer. Volunteers do not count their hours, ask for pay or even for reimbursement of their expenses. Somewhere along the way volunteerism must be recognized.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 21, 1984, at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 16, 1984

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its:

FIRST REPORT

Your Committee submits again to both Houses of Parliament the criteria it will use for the review and scrutiny of Statutory Instruments:

Whether any Regulation or other Statutory Instrument within the terms of reference, in the judgment of the Committee:

1. (a) is not authorized by the terms of the enabling statute, or, if it is made pursuant to the prerogative, its terms are not in conformity with the common law; or

(b) does not clearly state therein the precise authority for the making of the Instrument;

2. has not complied with the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act with respect to transmittal, recording, numbering or publication;

3. (a) has not complied with any tabling provision or other condition set forth in the enabling statute; or

(b) does not clearly state therein the time and manner of compliance with any such condition;

4. makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute or by the prerogative;

5. trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject;

6. (a) tends directly or indirectly to exclude the jurisdiction of the Courts without explicit authorization therefor in the enabling statute; or

(b) makes the rights and liberties of the subject dependent on administrative discretion rather than on the judicial process;

7. purports to have retroactive effect where the enabling statute confers no express authority so to provide or, where such authority is so provided, the retroactive effect appears to be oppressive, harsh or unnecessary;

8. appears for any reason to infringe the rule of law or the rules of natural justice;

9. provides without good and sufficient reason that it shall come into force before registration by the Clerk of the Privy Council;

10. in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of a technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation;

11. without express provision to the effect having been made in the enabling statute or prerogative, imposes a fine, imprisonment or other penalty, or shifts the onus of proof of innocence to the person accused of an offence;

12. imposes a charge on the public revenues or contains provisions requiring payment to be made to the Crown or to any other authority in consideration of any license or service to be rendered, or prescribes the amount of any such charge or payment, without express authority to that effect having been provided in the enabling statute or prerogative;

13. is not in conformity with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or with the Canadian Bill of Rights;

14. is unclear in its meaning or otherwise defective in its drafting;

15. for any other reason requires elucidation as to its form or purport.

Your Committee also reports that in relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38, the Committee was empowered during the Fourth Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, the First Session of the Thirty-First Parliament and the First Session of the Thirty-Second Parliament, "to conduct a comprehensive study of the means by which Parliament can better oversee the government regulatory process and in particular to enquire into and report upon:

1. the appropriate principles and practices to be observed,

(a) in the drafting of powers enabling delegates of Parliament to make subordinate laws;

(b) in the enactment of statutory instruments;

(c) in the use of executive regulation—including delegated powers and subordinate laws; and the manner in which Parliamentary control should be effected in respect of the same;

2. the role, functions and powers of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments."

Your Committee was unable to complete its study and therefore recommends that the same Order of Reference together with the evidence adduced thereon during the last two Parliaments and the First Session of the Thirty-Second Parliament be again referred to it.

Your Committee recommends: That its quorum be fixed at four (4) members, provided that both Houses are represented whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings to receive and authorize the printing of evidence so long as three (3) members are present, provided that both Houses are represented;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such expert staff, and such stenographic and clerical staff as may be required; and

Your Committee further recommends that it be empowered to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration on Thursday next, February 23, 1984.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

CANADIAN UNIVERSITIES SERVICE OVERSEAS—FINANCING

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government and has to do with the non-governmental organization called CUSO, the Canadian Universities Service Overseas. This NGO receives funds from the Canadian International Development Agency to carry out certain humanitarian projects in Third World countries.

When I was responsible for CIDA—the Canadian International Development Agency—I believe that over $500,000 was spent every year to provide CUSO and its organization with the funds required to carry out projects of interest to the communities where it was operating.

It has been learned that, as of April 1—and for more or less unknown reasons—a new policy may be implemented with respect to grants awarded to non-governmental organizations. Apparently, the Department of External Affairs has decided to drop the organization known as CUSO. Grants will no longer be available, with the result that 500 young Canadians now working on projects in various Third World nations of Africa and Asia will be recalled.

Since it is an extremely important issue and since a debate has already been launched among the Canadian public as to whether we ought to continue to support that organization, I think it would be very interesting to know just what the government intends to do about the non-governmental organization called CUSO.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will seek information and get an answer. As you know, a new director will be responsible for the activities of NGOs, as they are called. In any event, I will do my best to obtain the information before the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Asselin: Since this is an urgent problem and, as usual, the government might take quite some time before giving us the information needed to complete our files and eventually take part in debates in the Senate or in the other place, would it not be better if the government were to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Canadian International Development Agency President to appear before our Committee on Foreign Affairs with a view to explaining to us the new CIDA policies concerning non-governmental organizations?

Should the president be unable to appear, perhaps the minister might make a statement within the next few weeks so that we might know just where the Canadian government stands on the future development of NGOs in Canada.

Senator Frith: First of all, honourable senators, I reject the words "as usual" concerning the time I have taken to obtain answers. I believe that in every instance until now—

Senator Asselin: It took a whole year before I got answers to some of the questions I had asked.

Senator Frith: In any case, I reject the words "as usual".

As to the policy, of course I will add to my request for information the comments contained in the supplementary question of Senator Asselin.

If it is a new policy or something of that nature, I am prepared as well to suggest that someone appear before the Committee on Foreign Affairs or make a ministerial statement to explain the new policy, should that be the case.

THE BUDGET

INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT

● (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a couple of questions for the Acting Leader of the Government arising from the budget delivered last week.

In the budget paper, the government disclosed the interest burden it expected to pay on the national debt up until 1988; but in the calculation of such a figure one necessarily has to make some assumptions about the rate of interest. I did not find any statement in the budget of the government's forecast for the rate of interest over the period.

My question is: Will the Acting Leader of the Government be kind enough to furnish the house with the government's estimates of the rates of interest it calculates for the next few years upon which its debt service charge figure was based?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I gave notice last week of an inquiry relating to the budget. I plan to speak to that inquiry either today or on Thursday. It will probably be on Thursday. I will try to have the information available for the honourable senator then.

Senator Roblin: That would be very helpful.

MORTGAGE RATE PROTECTION PLAN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a couple of other points that my honourable friend might include in his speech.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): To give it some substance.

Senator Roblin: If the Acting Leader of the Government answers my questions correctly, there will be some substance so far as I am concerned. My question relates to the mortgage rate protection plan, which is based on a charge of 1.5 per cent on the total of the mortgage to be paid by the person who is being protected. It swings into action after a threshold of 2 per cent has been reached. My question has to do with the rate of interest the government has in mind. Does the government expect the mortgage rate protection plan to be self-supporting—in other words, paid for by the 1.5 per cent that the mortgagees will contribute, and so on; or is it expected that, based on the interest rates to which I have referred, there will be an element of subsidy as time goes by? What is the policy with respect to that? I do not expect my honourable friend to have the answer immediately, but perhaps he could provide one on Thursday.

Scattered throughout the budget is a series of tax changes, either suggested or actual—mostly suggested, because some of them reduce taxation—having to do with items such as small business taxation, the registered retirement savings plan, personal tax changes, the elimination of the $200 tax credit, the elimination of the $100 donation allowance, and other matters, all of which bear on the revenues of provinces—at least, of most provinces, because all but one have a taxation agreement with the federal government with respect to personal taxation, and all but two, I believe, with respect to corporate taxation.

My question is: What effect will these various changes have on the revenue position of the provinces, whose taxation systems are so closely linked with that of the federal government? Perhaps that question could also be dealt with on Thursday.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a further question. Some rather extensive changes in the Canada Pension Plan were proposed in the budget. The Canada Pension Plan is paid for by the nation's workers. Therefore, if any changes are to be made in that plan, they are the people who are going to pay. So far as the workers are concerned, this represents almost a wage tax, although I would not describe it as such myself. What changes in the levy for the Canada Pension Plan will result if the government's proposals are carried into effect? They have to do not only with the nature of the coverage but also with the amount of money on which the pension plan is based. They can become extremely important to wage earners, and I therefore ask my honourable friend if he could provide that information on Thursday to enable us to have a rational discussion of some of these ideas that were floated—if, indeed, they ever left dry dock—by the Minister of Finance last week.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yes. But let me make it clear that I undertook to try to have the information for Thursday and will try to include it in my speech on the inquiry. I cannot guarantee that I will be able to do so, but I will certainly try to get the information and provide it as part of my speech. If not, I will furnish it, when it becomes available, under delayed answers.

YOUTH AND OPPORTUNITY FUND

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have an easy question for the Acting Leader of the Government. It has to do with the Youth and Opportunity Fund. It has been in existence for some time, so it is nothing new. The purpose of that fund is to assist young people to acquire new skills and to find jobs. Would the acting leader give us a report on what has happened under that fund? What are the new skills and what do the statistics show with respect to these new skills? The trick in this business is to educate people for the jobs that are available. I would like to know what new skills were provided, for how many young people, and, as a result, how many of them found jobs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I would be glad to try to do that.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

BALTIC HONORARY CONSULS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if I may interrupt, at the request of Senators Bélisle and Yuzyk I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence in our gallery of Dr. Jonas Zmuidzinas, Honorary Consul General of Lithuania, Mr. Ilmar Heinsoo, Honorary General Consul of Estonia, and Dr. Edward Upenieks, Honorary Consul of Latvia.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—EFFECT OF INCREASE ON WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question has to do with the recent increase of $50 in the GIS. What effect will it have on veterans receiving the War Veterans Allowance after they reach the age of 65? For those who qualify, will this increase in the GIS be deducted from the War Veterans Allowance or will they get the full advantage of it?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Department of Veterans Affairs comes under the administration of Senator Austin so, on his behalf, I will undertake to try to get an answer.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—AMENDMENT PROCLAMATION— PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government and is related to the federal-provincial conference which, unless I am mistaken, will be held on March 7 and 8 to examine issues relating to native rights. My question is as follows: As honourable senators will recall, we adopted in this Chamber a resolution to authorize or permit an amendment to the Constitution Act, 1982 that would allow further constitutional conferences to be held on the same subject. What is the situation regarding similar resolutions that are required under the Constitution Act of legislative assemblies across Canada, to have this amendment adopted? Have all resolutions been adopted? When? Have any provinces abstained? Have any refused to adopt the resolution required to ratify the constitutional amendment?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, Indian and Inuit rights are officially the responsibility of Senator Austin. It is a subject that interests him and for which he has some responsibility. I would therefore refer this question to Senator Austin, so that he can provide the information requested as soon as it is available.

[English]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is your reply?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Do you have a reply?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What are you going to do?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): If Senator Tremblay has a specific question—

Senator Flynn: It was specific.

Senator Austin: —I shall be glad to reply. I shall review his question and answer it at another time.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, not knowing that Senator Austin was in charge—

Senator Flynn: He is in charge of everything.

Senator Tremblay: —I shall repeat my question. It is very simple. As we all know, to amend the Constitution in order to provide for other constitutional conferences with respect to the question of aboriginal rights, their definition and other related questions, we need resolutions from the Commons and from the Senate, as well as from seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population.

● (1430)

My question is this: Where do we stand at this time, some two weeks before the federal-provincial conference to be held on March 7 or 8, in terms of the resolutions which are supposed to come from the provincial legislatures? We know that the Commons adopted the resolution; we adopted the resolution two or three weeks before the termination of the last session of Parliament. Where are we in terms of the resolutions required from the provinces? How many provinces have adopted the resolution and how many have abstained? How many have refused to adopt the resolution? Those are my very specific, concrete questions.

Senator Austin: Thank you very much, Senator Tremblay. I shall make inquiries and shall reply as soon as possible.

I might say it would facilitate a quicker reply if you would provide me with notice ahead of time for a question which requires an accurate and researched answer.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, certainly not. It is a very simple question; you should know that.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—PROPOSED MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government. It has reference to the situation in Lebanon and it adverts to his reply of Thursday, which I listened to with great care at the time and which I have read with even greater care since. As I read the four parts of the answer I was reminded of a former minister and former senator, the Honourable Paul Martin, and I wondered if one of his speech writers was around at the time this answer was composed.

Since we are in a situation of grave peril and tremendous danger with Lebanon perhaps collapsing before our eyes, could the deputy leader inform the Senate if, in fact, the Canadian government is amenable to the suggestion that some useful purpose would be served by a U.N. presence and if our support of that suggestion would be likely sustained by our participation?

The question I asked the other day is still of interest to me: What about the discussions with the Soviet Union? Has the Canadian Prime Minister, in his splendid pursuit of peace, elicited from the Soviets their acquiescence to the establishment of a United Nations force in Lebanon? It would be helpful at this crucial time if the honourable senator could divulge to us the thinking of the government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, unless something occurred in the translation of the answer, I thought it was quite clear. The government is definitely openminded with respect to the idea of a U.N. force; and is equally openminded about Canadian participation in such a force, subject to the conditions I listed in the previous answer.

I do not think the suggestion was included that an additional condition should require the support of such a plan by the Soviet Union. I agree that it is a good thought advanced by Senator Macquarrie. In terms of government policy I cannot say whether or not it should be a condition. However, I understand why Senator Macquarrie raised this issue, since I am sure Soviet Union support would help the effectiveness of such a force. Therefore, I will ask if anything was obtained during the Prime Minister's peace initiative—described by Senator Macquarrie as “splendid”, which adjective I am pleased to associate myself with.

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I have a short statement on the current situation in Lebanon, as of 11 a.m. today. This is perhaps a good time to bring honourable senators up to date on that situation.

As Saudi mediation efforts between Beirut and Damascus continue, the military situation in Lebanon is unchanged, with the exception of stepped-up Israeli activity.

For the second time in 48 hours, Israel conducted air raids Tuesday at mid-morning against targets south of the Beirut-Damascus highway near Bamdoun, a Druze-controlled area with some Palestinian positions. Israeli military sources claimed four buildings serving as terrorist bases were destroyed; no Israeli planes were downed. Israeli forces have also moved to within 12 miles of Beirut, the furthest north since the IDF withdrew to the Awali River in September 1983. The operation was described as a search for Palestinian guerrillas. In recent days Israel has repeatedly warned Druze and Shia militias not to permit PLO infiltration into southern Lebanon.

In Beirut, sporadic fighting continued overnight along the Green Line. Artillery exchanges continue between the Lebanese armed forces outpost at the strategic town of Souk-el-Gharb and Druze positions. Redeployment of U.S. marines began at noon local time, and is likely to take at least a week.

Saudi Arabian negotiators are meeting in Damascus today with Syrian FM Khaddam, having informed President Gemayel last evening of Syria's conditions for a settlement—and I emphasize that these are Syria's conditions. These reportedly include: unconditional abrogation of the May 17 accord; refusal to link the pull-out of Israeli forces with a Syrian withdrawal; referral of the question of the Syrian military presence to the Arab League; and creation of a new government of national unity—

Hon. Martial Asselin: That's a dream.

Senator Frith: I am expressing Syria's dreams, not my own.

Syria objected to the earlier Saudi plan's provision for security arrangements for Israel in south Lebanon—which Syria considered no different from the May 17 accord—and the plan's call for simultaneous Syrian and Israeli withdrawals.

In case that could be misread to mean that the Syrian suggestion was simultaneous, what it says is that they are objecting to the plan's insistence on simultaneous withdrawal.

Syria's new demands make no mention of the status of President Gemayel; Syria's Druze and Shia allies continue to call for his resignation but the Phalange seems adamant that he remain.

Ambassador Jackson reports there have been no incidents involving Canadian citizens or embassy staff.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: I would like to thank Senator Frith for his reply and, since I must now make my interjection in the interrogative sense, I would ask him whether he sees our government participating in this difficult situation in some helpful way, having in mind the recent discussions between the Prime Minister and the new Soviet leader. I personally recall that, on previous occasions, although not a principal power in the Middle East, Canada has been able to find useful and helpful opportunities. I am also mindful of the fact that, without the acquiescence of the Soviet Union as a member of the Security Council, no U.N. peace force could be established. Also, in reference to any possibility that the Canadian government may be discussing with France—which is highly informed on the Middle East and is a very wise and objective power—the whole possibility of U.N. involvement as a last resort.

The answer struck me, in paragraphs (a) to (d), as being in such terms as would make it almost impossible for anything to be done. That is why I talked about its language.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add to what has been furnished with respect to government policy on the subject, in terms of both the government's attitude and paragraphs (a) to (d) referred to by Senator Macquarrie.

But when sending forward his question regarding the participation of the Soviet Union in such a force, or its attitude to such a force, or anything discussed on that subject between the Prime Minister and the General Secretary of the Communist Party and the President of the Soviet Union, I will underline that, if there is any further information on this policy, I should have it as well.

The other answer, as I think Senator Macquarrie realizes, I did piggy-back on top of his question; it was not meant to be an answer to his question.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

RECONSTRUCTION OF SENATE SPEAKER'S ENTRANCE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have three questions I should like to address to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. They are much more domestic and perhaps of less importance, on their face, than those already addressed this afternoon, but they are ones that I think are serious, and the answers will certainly be of great interest to all honourable senators.

The questions deal with the renovations proceeding to this building, particularly in connection with the entrance which I have become accustomed to calling the Speaker's entrance. That entrance has been demolished and is to be replaced. Work is going on outside the building at the present time, apparently, with that objective in mind. I am interested in what is taking place, as I am sure all honourable senators are. I hasten to say that I do not expect the answers to my questions to be accorded this afternoon. These are of such a nature that, if one is told that they are going to be taken as notice, one will fully understand.

First of all, when was final approval given for the construction work in question to proceed? It is proceeding, so obviously it must have been approved by someone.

Secondly, at whose request was this project conceived? I am interested in knowing who had the idea that this was a desirable and necessary project. It is perfectly clear that unless somebody asked that it be done, it would never have been started.

My final question is a standard one: I am interested in knowing, as I am sure other honourable senators are, what the project will cost.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as anticipated, I will take those questions as notice.

CRIMINAL CODE

SECTIONS 150 AND 153—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government, flowing from a situation in my home province which appears to have brought on quite a public outcry and involves the wording of sections 150 and 153 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Court rulings have indicated that an adopted child does not come within the meaning of the word "child" in the incest sections of the Criminal Code of Canada. My question, therefore, is: Would the acting leader be kind enough to ask the Minister of Justice if, in the whole raft of Criminal Code amendments now being proceeded with in the House of Commons, consideration could be given to the cleaning up of those sections so that adopted children would have the same protection from sexual abuse as do natural children?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Did I understand you to say that this public outcry is the result of a decision interpreting those sections to mean that an adopted child is not a "child" as far as the offence of incest is concerned?

Senator Nurgitz: Under what we all understand to be the incest section, an adopted child is not the same as a natural child. Because I was lobbied on the weekend and did not have a copy of the Criminal Code handy, I have since taken the trouble to look at those sections. I am not satisfied that the judge is wrong because, as I read those sections, I am not satisfied they cover the situation of an adopted child, thus leaving an adopted child without protection.

Senator Frith: I thank Senator Nurgitz for mentioning that because, if that is so, obviously this is the time to clean-up those sections. I am sure it was never the legislative intent to exclude adopted children.

[Senator Donahoe.]

As Senator Nurgitz knows, that very problem had to be settled over the years as far as testamentary and non-testamentary succession was concerned, and generally in the common law and in the civil law. I am thankful he has raised this question, and I shall certainly pass it on to the Minister of Justice.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX EVASION—PUBLICATION OF LIST—TASK FORCE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Nurgitz asked questions last week about the special task force within the Department of National Revenue information division.

I have some information, but it does not really deal with the particular question we tightened our focus on last week—that is, whether they are going to study the efficacy of publishing the names of the innocent. In any event, I will read the information I have received on the four questions.

The first question was: "When is the task force to commence its work?" The answer is that the task force has begun its work. Its chairman has outlined the task force's objectives and program; he has identified and begun to assemble staff; and has been working with the minister and the department since the beginning of February 1984.

The second question was: "When is it to conclude its work and make a report?" The answer is that the task force intends to conclude its work within two to three months; that is, by the end of April 1984. During this time the task force will be involved in evaluating existing communications activities and, in some instances, developing new initiatives. The work of the task force will therefore appear primarily as part of the ongoing communications activities of the department. A summary of the task force's activities and conclusions may be prepared, but no formal statement or report is planned.

The third question was: "Will the findings of the task force be made public?" The answer is that if a formal report is prepared it will be made public.

The fourth question related to the background of members of the task force, and was: "Is anyone with some legal background involved on the task force?" The answer is that the members of the task force are all communications specialists. If legal advice is required, it will be obtained from the Department of Justice.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question. Because I do not think that the acting leader and I are very much apart on the issue, I trust that he will agree that a suggestion be sent forward that someone with a legal background, from somewhere other than the Kremlin, should have some input into it.

Further, the answer is not satisfactory because of its general nature. I do not care about the other communications problems they have. Will the task force deal directly and tell the public whether it will name innocent people, along with guilty ones, when it publishes the information it does publish?

Senator Frith: I do not know whether I can go so far as to say that it will or will not, but I thought we had agreed that we wanted to find out whether they were going to look at that question and explain why they have been doing that. I will pass that question along.

Senator Nurgitz: Thank you.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIAN CUT-OFF LANDS SETTLEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Paul Lucier moved the second reading of Bill C-18, to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian Bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this bill, which provides for the settlement of a particular category of land claims by Indian bands in British Columbia.

As most of us are aware, 22 Indian bands have long-standing claims for compensation for lands removed from their reserves in 1920 without their consent. I should like to make it clear at the outset that there are pressing reasons why this legislation has been proposed today with such urgency.

Two years ago, the federal government, the B.C. government and the Penticton band, after 15 years of discussions and negotiations, signed an agreement to settle claims regarding lands cut off from their reserve in 1920. The agreement declared that federal legislation required that in order to put the agreement into effect it must be passed by March 6, 1984. If the legislation is not passed by then, the British Columbia government will have no legal obligation to transfer to the Penticton band the negotiated amount of $1 million, plus $200,000 in interest. There would also be a delay in returning almost 5000 hectares of land to the native bands involved. That is why this bill is before you today requesting your prompt consideration.

You would have received this bill before today, but following the government's tabling of a draft for discussion last June, some bands asked for changes. All parties discussed the draft, reached a consensus and changes were made. As is usually the case when governments seek co-operation, agreement and approval, considerable time was required. Only now are we in a position to proceed with this legislation.

The main objective of this bill is to approve and give the force of law to existing agreements and to provide for the approval of future agreements by Governor in Council. The legislation will also give legal authority to the 22 Indian bands to sign agreements with the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia to settle these claims.

I believe that this bill merits the support of all honourable senators and I should like to mention briefly why I seek your support. Anyone who is familiar with the history of the cut-off lands knows that the members of these 22 bands have reason to feel alienated and frustrated, as my colleagues explained in greater detail in the other place. In summary, the following is what was explained in the other place last week. In 1912, the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia agreed to consider changes in the established Indian reserves. For that purpose, a joint royal commission was set up to make recommendations. It was known as the McKenna-McBride commission. The Indian bands throughout British Columbia were visited by the McKenna-McBride commission and were assured that no lands would be taken away from the Indian reserves without their consent. These assurances were repeated and recorded many times. Indian leaders were co-operative, open and trusting. In 1916, the royal commission submitted its report, which included recommendations for cutting off lands from the reserves of 22 bands.

In 1919, the British Columbia legislature passed the Indian Affairs Settlement Act.

In 1920, the Parliament of Canada enacted the Indian Land Settlement Act. But the federal legislation waived the need for consent from the bands. That is what has caused resentment, frustration and bitterness for more than 60 years. The people of these 22 bands consider this a breach of agreement, because lands were cut off without their consent. The two governments finally agreed to begin negotiations with the committee representing the 22 bands in 1977, which is seven years ago. Two years ago detailed negotiations began with the 22 individual bands. They all agreed that, wherever possible, the original lands were to be returned to the bands. The land settlements with all the bands involve a total of more than 12,000 hectares. Approximately 10 per cent will not be returned and the governments instead will pay compensation.

Of the six agreements already reached, the settlement with the Penticton band provides for the largest transfer of land—almost 5000 hectares. The settlement with the Westbank band provides a large compensation—almost $7 million. The lands and the compensation involved in the other four existing agreements are smaller.

Settlement of the cut-off lands claims in British Columbia is but one example of righting the wrongs done to the Indian people that have contributed to their feeling unfairly treated, and it may remove the deep mistrust which has perplexed too many of our Indian people, our fellow Canadians, in this century.

Honourable senators should know that the Government of British Columbia has contributed a great deal to the success of these negotiations. The agreements already signed demonstrate once again that a common vision and a common goal can bring together our two governments to create a just solution to this problem. The most essential contributors to this solution, however, are the Indian leaders of the 22 bands. It is their patience, perseverance and persistence that have brought this proposal before us today. All parties have invested much good will, time and effort to reach this ultimate step on the way to success. We now have an opportunity to consider the merits of this legislation and to decide on the approval of this important part in this settlement. I believe that the British Columbia Indian Cut-off Lands Settlement Bill deserves our full support. By providing this support, we can help to correct an unjust situation. All Canadians can be assured that the legitimate demands of the first nations of this land will be met by the various governments.

In concluding my remarks, I should like to add that we are presently in the midst of negotiations for some important land claims in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and other parts of Canada. I think this is a very important first step in showing that, with the co-operation of the governments involved and the bands themselves, we can succeed in settling the land claims.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I commend Senator Lucier for his presentation. I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-18, to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves.

Our acting leader indicated last week and again today that we would give this bill consent without delay. That remark gives me the opportunity to say that this bill, like so many others, comes before us during the last week prior to a break in parliamentary sittings, and it has a deadline on it. If Bill C-18 is not passed by March 6, certain obligations for money to be paid to the Indian bands by the British Columbia government will have expired.

I should like to draw your attention to the fact that this is the kind of government procedure that eats away at the credibility of this chamber.

Basically, my speech is a repetition of Senator Lucier's, except to add that, when British Columbia became a province in 1871, Crown lands were set aside that came to be known as Indian lands. Since the beginning there have been differences of opinion between the Government of British Columbia and the federal government.

Senator Lucier has already described the McKenna-McBride commission and its recommendations, but perhaps the most important recommendation was the cutting off of reserve land that did not meet the criterion of specific need with the consent of the Indians. After the McKenna-McBride commission submitted its report, the British Columbia Legislature passed the Indian Affairs Settlement Act. In 1920, Parliament enacted the Indian Land Settlement Act, thus eliminating the need to obtain the consent of the bands. That is a brief outline of what has caused discontent among 22 bands of British Columbia Indians.

● (1500)

Passage of this bill will return 12,000 hectares of cut-off lands to the 22 bands and provide cash settlements for the lands that were cut off.

Our party is pleased to support this bill which will bring an end to a wrong that has been allowed to continue for over 60 years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators—

[Senator Lucier.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have to inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Lucier speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-18.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I appreciate the remarks just made by Senator Bielish.

I would only add that I agree with her about the deadline—that is, once more receiving a bill just before an adjournment.

I have had some involvement with claims in the Yukon and, while I do not like to defend the government too much, I should point out that, in this particular instance, the Indian bands themselves have been very careful in their negotiations to make sure that there is a consensus among their people. This sometimes takes quite a long period of time. Therefore, although I accept Senator Bielish's comments about the length of time, once in a while there is good reason for it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with your leave, I would like to start by congratulating our new Speaker on his appointment to the Chair of this Chamber. Several days after he took up his duties, I was one of the Speaker's guests at an official dinner that was international in character. I remarked at the time on the eloquence and distinction with which he spoke on behalf of the Senate and Canada. I was very proud both as a Senator and as a Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that your term in the Speaker's chair, although it may be relatively brief, because this Thirty-Second Parliament is drawing inexorably to a close—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Thank God!

Senator Murray: —I hope that this term will be an agreeable and satisfying one.

I also wish to congratulate our colleagues, Senators Bosa and Hébert, who did an admirable job in starting the debate on the Throne Speech.

I also would like to extend a very cordial welcome to those of our colleagues who were very recently appointed to the Senate. Many of our new colleagues have been good friends of mine for a long time. Of course I would have preferred to see some Progressive Conservatives appointed to the Senate, but since the Prime Minister felt obliged to appoint Liberals, he could not have made a better choice.

Three days ago, the present Government finished the fourth year of its term of office. It is now starting its fifth year in power since the elections of 1980. After four years, Canadians are entitled to have their say about the Government. After four years, Canada is entitled to a general election. For all practical purposes, the Government's term has come to an end. Considering the fact that for twenty-nine months, public opinion has been turning increasingly against the Government, and in the last eight months that percentage has become the majority, Canadians must be allowed to exercise their democratic rights in a general election. There is no justification for further delay.

Only political cowardice or contempt for the democratic process could explain why, after four years in power, the Government refuses to announce a general election. It has to, if it has any respect for democracy.

[English]

Honourable senators, the new government that will be elected, I trust soon—

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Dream while you are feeling good.

Senator Murray: The new government that will be elected soon—or as soon as the present government has the courage to call the election in this fifth year of its mandate—will have to grapple with many serious problems, chief among which is the dismal state of our economy. The Canadian economy is in a prolonged period of underachievement: underachievement by our own historical standards and underachievement by current international standards. The most urgent problem facing the new government will be to reverse the economic decline that we have known.

● (1510)

The signs of recovery that we have seen lately are to be welcomed, but they are looking more and more faint. Less and less do these signs of recovery seem to herald a period of renewed and sustained economic growth. One has only to look at the indicators. Unemployment is in the 11 per cent range and is projected to remain there for at least another year or two. Interest rates are still high and are projected to remain high and to be an obstacle to economic growth. Business capital investment is still declining. Canadian manufacturing is operating at about 70 per cent of capacity. These are the immediate conditions that the new government must set about trying to improve.

Nobody pretends that improvement will be quick or easy. But beyond this—our immediate preoccupation with these debilitating economic conditions—it is a deplorable fact that there is no consensus in this country about our long-term economic interest or our long-term economic policy. It is not that we lack for advice. We have had the annual reviews and the various special reports of the Economic Council of Canada, of the Science Council and of various parliamentary committees, including the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which have addressed themselves from time to time to various aspects of longer-term economic policy. We have many non-government institutes, among which are the C. D. Howe Institute and the North South Institute. The government is bombarded with advice, and shortly it appears that there will be issued an interim report from the Donald Macdonald commission.

These bodies, however, do not set the political agenda for the country. The political agenda is set by politicians and, in particular, by governments. What I want to say is that a new government in this country will have to rewrite the political agenda in Canada to focus on Canada's interdependence with the rest of the world. What does that interdependence imply? First, it implies the need to adapt our industries and our economy to the changing state of international comparative advantage.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Secondly, it implies the need to review constantly and to supplement the knowledge and skills of our people so that Canadians can cope with and prosper in these changing conditions. Thirdly, it implies the need for Canada to take a role of leadership in improving the management of the world economy. In particular, Canada should be in the forefront of those international institutions that are concerned with trade, aid, investment and international finance. Without such policies of adjustment and adaptation, Canada will face economic stagnation in the future.

Honourable senators, this is hardly a new theme. It has been emphasized in many of the reports and studies I and others have alluded to. But Canadians, generally, do not yet see how important the world economy is to this country. Our government leadership has all the right rhetoric about interdependence, but its actions are too often inward-looking, unnecessarily nationalistic, restrictive of trade and investment, and inhibiting of industrial adjustment.

Canada is a trading nation. More or less one-quarter of its GNP is accounted for by exports. Not even Japan is as dependent on exports as is Canada. The Trade Division of the Department of External Affairs estimates that some 2 million Canadians work in areas directly or indirectly related to exporting; that is, one in five people in our labour market are so employed. Almost 70 per cent of those exports go to the United States, and of course that is the relationship that matters most.

As a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, I signed Volume III of the report on Canada-U.S. Relations. The committee recommended the negotiation of a bilateral free-trade agreement with the United States, but our report emphasized that such an arrangement need not sacrifice Canada's trade with Third World countries nor reduce Canada's commitment to liberalize multi-lateral trade. Our report explicitly rejected the idea of a common market or a Canada-U.S. customs union in which we would set up a common external tariff against the rest of the world. I wanted to underline this fact because I saw a report in the Globe and Mail of February 1 suggesting that the Donald Macdonald commission is considering some form of free trade between Canada and the United States. The article, written by Thomas Walkom, notes the following:

There is a powerful undercurrent of economic nationalism in Canada, which has pulled under governments proposing reciprocity.

The Macdonald Commission has been considering one suggestion, however, that might appease the nationalists—to increase protection against European and Asian countries while increasing trade with the United States.

What concerns me, of course, is the thought that there has to be a trade-off—that we have to increase protection against Europe and, in particular, against Asia, in order to negotiate something with the United States in the way of freer trade.

Honourable senators, I do not want to excoriate the Donald Macdonald commission on the basis of a speculative newspaper report. But if, in its interim report or in its final report, it does come up with any such nonsense as was suggested in the paragraphs I have quoted, then it should be sent packing. The 30 per cent or more of our exports that do not go to the United States but to other countries is not insignificant.

In 1981, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—God rest its soul, it no longer exists—identified Japan, Australia, Hong Kong, South Korea and the five Asian countries—Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand, Indonesia and the Philippines—as priority countries for concentrated export efforts by Canada. The Prime Minister visited those Asian countries last year, presumably in the hope and expectation of increasing our exports to that area. Various studies—most recently, a North-South Institute report of last September—have identified potential markets for Canadian manufactured goods and services, communications, transportation, power generating facilities and capital equipment of various kinds in that area.

Honourable senators, we have more than enough tariff and non-tariff barriers against these very same countries.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: The evidence is that these barriers undermine our export promotion efforts. We can kiss these export opportunities goodbye and we should forget this rhetoric about the Pacific Rim if we proceed now to increase protectionism against those countries as some kind of a political trade-off for a bilateral arrangement with the United States. We have to be concerned about Canada's credibility in these matters. Without credibility, we cannot help create a viable world economy.

The Brandt Commission several years ago pointed out how the developing countries can be an engine of growth for the industrialized countries. We have heard a great deal about the debt problems of some of the developing countries, but after the 1973 oil shock, the money placed by the OPEC countries into the commercial banks was borrowed by the better-off developing countries and the recycling helped to create markets for our manufacturers. One OECD study indicated that this recycling was worth 900,000 jobs a year in the industrialized countries, every year from 1973 to 1977.

● (1520)

The report of the World Bank for 1983 and the Annual Report of the International Monetary Fund for 1983 also emphasized the point that, over time, expansion is transmitted from the industrial countries to the developing countries and back to the industrial countries.

In the 1970s the developing countries were the fastest growing sector of the world economy. Not too long ago I saw a speech by the U.S. Secretary of State, Mr. Schultz, who, in referring to the developing countries, said:

Their strong performance reinforced the expansion of world trade in the 1970s and provided the leading edge of world growth.

He went on to say that we have seen the same linkage work in reverse during the recent recession. Secretary Schultz said that over half of the decline in the gross national product in 1982 had come from a deterioration in its international accounts, in particular its exports to the developing countries.

When Robert McNamara was in Ottawa last fall, he said that the United States had lost 250,000 jobs:

—solely because Mexico's imports from the U.S. have declined because of the very serious economic problems faced by Mexico.

Canada's direct economic interest in these developing countries is not, of course, as great as that of the United States, but it is not insignificant. Approximately $7 billion of exports—roughly 10 per cent of our total exports—go to the non-oil exporting developing countries. While approximately 10 per cent of our manufactured goods go to those countries, for the rest of the world, the industrial world as a whole exports approximately 28 per cent of its manufactured goods to the developing countries. The figure is 40 per cent in the case of the United States and over 40 per cent in the case of Japan. So our direct economic interest—10 per cent of our exports—is less than that of the United States or Japan.

We do, however, have a tremendous, indirect interest, if only because of the dependence of our major partners on this trade. What is most significant for Canada—for a country of our size—is the enormous stake that we have in a well managed world economy. Canada does not have the power to dictate terms of trade to her competitors and customers, and therefore her interest is in strong international institutions and in sound international agreements respecting trade, investment and finance. As Canadians, we should bring some sense of commitment, of vision, if you like, to GATT. Instead, we are on the carpet in GATT because of our discriminatory and restrictive investment policies; and for a couple of years we have been in some international disrepute in the international community because of our energy policies.

Most serious so far as the developing countries are concerned is that we have clung to this multifibre arrangement, now extended to 1986, and have helped to distort its original short-term transitional character. The multifibre arrangement has been described by the World Bank as:

—the most extreme example of trade restriction since governments started to undo the protectionism that contributed to the depression of the 1930s.

The evidence is overwhelming, not only that protectionism in this area is very costly to the Canadian consumer, but that the most generous government adjustment policies or programs for workers, for firms, for communities affected by import competition would be less costly and more equitable than the cost of trade protection. Study after study has shown the same thing.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: Much the same can be said with regard to the footwear import quotas that were introduced as an emergency measure seven or eight years ago, and they have been expanded and extended in time since then.

The year-end review of the North South Institute here in Ottawa noted the creation by the government of agencies such as the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board, and saw in the creation of such agencies some progress toward industrial adjustment strategy. But it added:

—its effectiveness is undermined by import policy measures that work at cross purposes to adjustment objectives.

We have just completed—one hopes we have completed and are not stuck in the quagmire for some years to come—three years of stagnant or declining world trade. In the industrialized world, we will not be on the path of sustained growth unless and until the momentum of economic growth is renewed in the developing countries.

At noon today I heard the President of CIDA say that no recovery that we can imagine in the industrialized world can possibly create the number of jobs that we need in Canada to bring our unemployment rate down in the next few years. So we have quite a stake in increasing the momentum of economic activity and economic growth in those developing countries. That is why the debt problem of those countries is of such concern.

It is quite facile and unfair to say, "It is mismanagement on their part that got them into this trouble". Certainly, there is mismanagement; but, primarily, those countries are victims of a number of circumstances. First, the recession in the north reduced the demand for the exports of those developing countries; second, inflation in the north increased the cost of the goods those developing countries import from us; third, high interest rates around the world imposed on them a debt servicing burden that really was crippling. In the case of some of those countries that are dependent upon a single commodity, commodity prices took a dive. No wonder they have a liquidity problem. It would take superhuman political and economic management to maintain growth and stability under those circumstances.

If we examine the record of developing countries over the period of the 1970s, by and large we will find that there has been good economic and social progress, and very good progress toward self-sufficiency in food in some of those countries. On the whole, the record—with the exceptions that tend to stand out and are talked about a great deal in the media and elsewhere—has been very good; but, because of the current debt situation, the commercial banks have cut back severely on new financing to the developing countries. The resources of the International Monetary Fund have not been sufficient to keep pace with the needs and are not now sufficient to keep pace with the projected needs. The result is that the somewhat better-off developing countries that used to obtain commercial credit are now refused commercial credit and are competing with the poorest of the poor countries for foreign aid. Meanwhile, the aid from the industrialized countries is insufficient at 0.39 per cent of GNP, and, taking the OECD countries as a whole, is still far from the target of 0.7 per cent of GNP.

Many of the lower income countries are crucially dependent upon foreign aid as a source of foreign exchange and for their own development programs.

In Canada, as honourable senators are well aware, we have domestic programs aimed at overcoming regional disparity. These programs have a good economic rationale in terms of increasing individual opportunity and in terms of regional and national economic growth. In the broad sense of the word "political", they also have a political rationale in that they are essential to anyone's concept of national unity. I believe that it is equally in Canada's interest to promote and participate fully in international development assistance programs. Again, there is a solid economic rationale, as can be demonstrated. There is also a compelling political rationale: the alleviation of conditions that breed instability and violence and lead to international conflict.

● (1530)

I am aware that not everybody shares this view. Some Canadians are opposed to foreign aid. Others think that the aid policy should be drastically altered to reflect this or that ideological, economic or political priority. It is true to say that there is not a good understanding in this country of our aid policy and our programs; that is partly because the government has never articulated its objectives very clearly. Various groups are now springing up in the country with the intent of challenging Canada's aid programs. I do not agree with them or their views, but their activities may have the benefit of forcing the government and the various political parties to think through their policies in this area, the better to explain and defend them and to obtain support from the Canadian people.

In 1980 there was an all-party committee of the House of Commons that studied North-South relations. In its report the committee made the following point, in quoting Robert McNamara, the former U.S. Secretary of Defence and former President of the World Bank:

It used to be said that lack of capital was the chief obstacle to economic growth. But we now know that capital formation explains less than one-third of the variations in growth rates among developing countries; human resource development explains a great deal more. Investment in the human potential of the poor, then, is not only morally right, it is very sound economics.

The House of Commons task force recommended, among other things, that that chamber set up a standing committee with a mandate to consider issues of international developments. The House of Commons has not followed through on that recommendation. I am not suggesting that we should set up another committee here. For one thing, the relatively small number of Progressive Conservative senators is already over-taxed in terms of covering the various committees. However, I would like to see one of our committees take upon itself the responsibility of monitoring government policy and progress in the areas I have mentioned.

First, there is our trade policy. We should force the proponents of protectionist measures to defend them in terms of the cost benefit to the Canadian economy. We should examine in particular non-tariff barriers as they are brought in. New ones are being invented all the time. We should monitor Canada's participation in various multilateral forums such as GATT, the IMF, the World Bank and so on. As an aside, and I think an important one, I think we should provide for more parliamentary participation in those forums. We routinely send members of the Senate and House of Commons to the United Nations General Assembly. For example, Senator Neiman and I had the privilege of being there in 1980 at the Special Session on Development. However, some of the most important decisions are being taken and some of the most important discussions are being held in forums such as GATT, the IMF and the World Bank. I think it would be extremely useful to have senators, members of Parliament and, in fact, members of the provincial legislatures, if it can be arranged, attend meetings of that kind so that we could all become better educated on these issues. In that way, perhaps, we could help sensitize the international community and our own bureaucracy to some of the important political considerations. I think we should call ministers and officials to account for Canada's policy in these fields.

With regard to our aid programs, I think one of our committees should take it upon itself to monitor those programs involved in both bilateral aid and aid given through multilateral agencies. We must scrutinize more carefully some of the claims made by proponents of aid programs. Such claims as "There is going to be a quick and early pay-off from this foreign aid investment" are claims that lead to disillusionment with aid programs. We have to examine the objectives of these programs and their successes and failures. There have been many successes in terms of Canada's aid programs. We should also look at the aid programs of other countries. Finally, and most importantly, I think we have to monitor the adjustment programs that are brought in by this government to help our industries and our entire economy adjust to the changing international situation. These programs are going to become vital to our economic survival and prosperity in the years ahead.

Honourable senators, I have tried to touch on some of the issues that are related to Canada's interdependence with the rest of the world. I cheerfully admit that I have not discussed any of them in any depth. Let me sum up what I have to say in these words: We hear a great deal about economic stagnation, the stagnation of the world economy, the need for specialization in the domestic and world economy, and the need for the economy to be more efficient and more competitive; and these are important subjects. But, surely, economic progress comes, not only from making the existing market more efficient, but from expanding that market. We cannot continue to fight over shares of the existing market, which some commentators see as becoming increasingly a replacement market for consumer goods and industries that reached their maturity in the seventies. So we have to expand the market. Where is it going to be expanded? Where else but among the hundreds of millions of people who are not now engaging in economic activity, who are not buyers and sellers. I learned the other day, for example, that Brazil, with something like six times the population of Canada, has only the same numbers, in round figures, as Canada in the area of economic activity, and that India, for another example, has some 350 million people living at or near the subsistence level. These are the new people who, over time, have to be brought into the market. That is the job of the development agencies and the function of international development policies, including our own.

Again, it is hardly a new theme but we do have the experience and capacity to realize our goals through a concerted international effort. I believe that this challenge of our interdependence with the world is the number one challenge facing the next Parliament of Canada. I believe that it is a historic opportunity for a new government coming to office in this country to place our own economy on a path of long-term viability and to make a lasting contribution to world economic expansion and international stability.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Will the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Murray: Certainly.

Senator Rowe: I understood him to say that in 1980 an all-party committee was set up to study North-South relations and that one of the recommendations was that there be a permanent committee to carry on this study. The honourable senator said that this recommendation was not acted upon. Was any reason given for not taking the advice of that all-party committee at the time?

Senator Murray: I do not know of any such reason. The government made quite a detailed reply to the various recommendations of the task force in question. While I do not have the document in front of me, the government probably took the position that the House of Commons would be master of its own procedures and could set up a standing committee, if it so desired. The matter seems to have been dropped there.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—
(Honourable Senator Steuart).

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, first, I should like to congratulate Senator Molgat and the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, the joint chairmen of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Reform of the Senate, for the manner in which they conducted this study. They gave everyone, who wished it, the opportunity to be heard; all who appeared before the committee were given a respectful hearing and were subjected to intelligent questioning. When they finally received the green light to go ahead, they moved with dispatch and their report is clear, understandable and to the point.

The committee has asked for public discussion. I am pleased to be given the opportunity to engage in consideration of its report. The report correctly states that the committee was confined by the terms of reference to the narrow study of Senate reform, which precluded consideration of the larger questions of parliamentary reform or government reform. When the committee was set up and the terms of reference were made public, I found this very narrow approach hard to understand; and, now, having studied the report, I find it even more incomprehensible.

To begin with, the question arises: Why have we had this study? What is wrong in Canada that we need to appoint a joint committee of Parliament and instruct it to consider and report upon ways in which the Senate of Canada can be reformed, in order to strengthen its role in representing people from all regions of Canada and to enhance the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country?

Honourable senators, those who decided to have a committee and decreed the terms of reference are obviously convinced that Parliament does not now properly represent all regions of Canada and that, at present, it is too weak to speak for and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country. I presume those in authority who set up this committee and literally demanded that it report on ways to reform only one house of Parliament must see a great deal of discontent in all parts of Canada with the present situation in Ottawa.

If we look at the facts, honourable senators, we must agree that separatism in Quebec and western Canada, great discontent in Atlantic Canada, and even rumblings in Ontario give us all cause for great concern. Studies done by Gallup indicate that, to a large percentage of young Canadians, Parliament—that is, both houses—and even the entire government, including the ever-growing Prime Minister's Office and the Public Service, are inefficient and unresponsive. In other words, the total Canadian government is looked upon by too many Canadians of all ages and from all regions as out of step with their real needs and, in fact, out of step with the times.

In the face of all this discontent, what does our government do to show that they really are responsive to the situation? They decide, once again, to reform the Senate. I say "once again" because, over the years, whenever a Canadian government is faced with mounting problems and all normal solutions seem to have failed, they very often launch a Senate reform movement.

With all this reform taking place you would think the Senate had been changed over the years out of all recognition. The truth is that if one of the original senators from 117 years ago dropped in on us today the only real difference he would notice would be that now, finally, there are a few women in the chamber and we hardly ever sit on Wednesdays.

The reason all these so-called Senate reform movements have never amounted to anything is that no one has really taken them seriously. Why should anyone take the half-hearted attempts at changing the Senate seriously, when the various governments themselves have not believed in what they were proposing, including the present government? Why do I say that the present government is not serious when it proposes to do something about regional discontent and unresponsive government? Because it refuses to tackle the problem where it really exists.

Let us look at where the real power resides in our federal government. I think the power structure goes something like this: On the top is the Prime Minister and his office—the famous PMO; then the top bureaucrats—the deputy ministers and some assistant deputy ministers. Next down the ladder is the cabinet; and following that in the power hierarchy is the House of Commons. Finally, at the bottom, is the Senate.

By saying you can cure all, or even part, of the regional discontent in Canada by changing the Senate is something like a doctor telling a patient he has a major heart condition but the first thing he is going to look after is his hangnail.

Of course, the Senate should be reformed; it should have been changed a long time ago. The Senate itself has proposed many excellent reforms, all of which have been ignored by successive governments, including the present one.

Why have these proposals never been acted upon? I do not know. Sometimes I suspect that, if the Senate had been made a more effective arm of Parliament, various governments would have lost a convenient whipping boy; the public's attention might have focused on where the real need for reform lies—that is, in the PMO, the cabinet and, mostly, in the elected House of Commons.

I am convinced that the proposition that an elected Senate can seriously address regional discontent in Canada is a dangerous one because it will continue to obscure our real problem, which is a weak and impotent House of Commons. If we agree to an elected Senate, and as a result convince the people of Canada that this is even a partial answer to their problems, I believe it will take at least 20 years to prove us wrong—and our federation cannot stand 20 more years of regional strains.

We all know the Senate was created to balance regional and ethnic needs. It was set up to be a counterbalance to the democratically elected House of Commons. However, that was 117 years ago, when democratically elected governments were a relatively new experiment, not wholly trusted at that time.

As well, we must remember that, in spite of its obvious shortcomings, the Senate has helped to hold Canada together. It has helped Canada to grow and prosper, to become one of the wealthiest, most caring and freedom-loving nations on earth.

Let us not try to load something on the back of this institution which it has never carried very well and which it will fail to carry in the future. I am referring to the future role of the Senate as proposed in chapter 4 of the report, namely, that the Senate is to represent regional interests and to act as a counterweight to the democratically chosen House of Commons.

I suggest that a reformed House of Commons could and should be the institution to represent and balance regional differences. I also suggest that since the House of Commons, as it now operates, carries little weight in Canada's modern government, the last thing in the world it needs is a counterweight.

In this regard, to illustrate my point, I will use my own experience in Saskatchewan, where I have been involved in municipal, provincial and federal politics for almost 40 years. In the 1920s, 1930s and even into the 1940s, we sent down to Ottawa a majority of Liberal members from Saskatchewan. In the beginning these Liberal MPs appeared to have some power. However, they gradually became apologists for the policies of the central government, and they lost support.

Then the Saskatchewan people turned to the relatively new CCF, now the NDP. While it did not accomplish much, it raised hell with the Liberal government, which pleased the voters back home.

Then came John Diefenbaker, and at long last the people of Saskatchewan and most of western Canada felt they were tuned into the government in Ottawa. However, the Diefenbaker government fell and most Saskatchewan voters were on the outside looking in once more. I have never been sure whether their discontent is with the system or with Liberal governments. Whatever it is, it is real and must be taken seriously.

The point I want to make here is that, in all the years I have heard people from Saskatchewan complaining about the central government, I have almost never heard any of them mention a senator or the Senate. I do not think they have any higher regard for this body than other Canadians have, but the fact is that it is to the members of the House of Commons that they look, and always have, to get them a better deal out of Ottawa. They elect those people to represent them, and when the members bow down to party discipline and vote against what is perceived to be their regional interests, the voters throw them out of office and try a new party. But, honourable senators, we have run out of political parties. If the Conservatives find a way to stay in power for any length of time, disillusion will set in with them also in western Canada.

Party discipline is the price of maintaining power under our present system, and once the Tories go down that road the west will turn on them just as quickly as they did on the Liberals and on the NDP.

In this report, it is suggested that we tell our Saskatchewan voters and others, "Look, we have a new system. You have been electing 13 members from Saskatchewan to the House of Commons, and we admit that, over the years, shortly after being elected they forgot you farmers or started trying to convince you that, for example, paying an additional $400 million a year to move your grain to market was really in your best interests. Of course, you did not believe them; you booted them out and started planning a revolution."

We will tell them, "Under the new system you will, of course, continue to elect the 13 members to the House of Commons, whom you do not really believe represent you; but now you will be allowed to elect 12 new members called senators and, please believe us, they will never forget where they came from. However, we must point out that, while we know that half the fun in western Canadian politics is throwing the bums out after four or eight years, these new senators will be elected for nine years and will not be allowed to run again. This will make them very independent, we hope. We are not sure whom it will make them independent of—you, the voters, or the party big shots—or maybe both; but the one thing we are sure of is that you, the farmers, will be the winners. In other words, you elected 13 people who did not do the job. Would you now like to try for 12 more who might?"

Fellow senators, some of you might want to go out to Melfort, Saskatchewan, for example, and try to sell that to a hall full of hard-working, hard-nosed prairie farmers, but I am not going to try. Even if you could sell that idea—and I do not think you could—I do not believe it would work. We shall have two elected bodies sharing a very limited amount of power, frustrating each other and deepening regional discontent, not healing it.

Over the years, we have elected good people from all parties, and all parts of Canada, to the House of Commons, and most of them have tried their best to represent their regions. In some cases they have succeeded; but all too often they are licked by the system before they start. So, I say, let us change the system.

Over the years, there have been many good suggestions. For example, it was suggested that the rules be changed so that an opportunity to defeat a government could only occur three or four times a year on straight no-confidence motions. Another suggestion was that the no-confidence votes should fall on pre-arranged dates so that no one could play tricks. I do not think the Canadian public would want an election because one party hid behind the curtains and defeated the government by tricking them. Another suggestion was that, except for votes of no confidence, every vote on every bill should be a free vote. In that way, members could vote with their conscience, not with fear of facing an election.

This is neither the time nor the place to go into possible changes to, or reform of, the House of Commons. However, I shall make one suggestion—that we, in the Senate, ask for another joint committee; but this time the Senate would have a majority of the members and the committee would study and report on House of Commons reform. Since ten members of the other place were willing to sacrifice their time to tell us how to reform our end of Parliament, I think it only fair that we do the same for them.

Honourable senators, I am reasonably sure that the Canadian people will fail to see any logic in electing a new group of 144 members and sending them to Ottawa to do the job that the 282 members they have already sent down here have apparently failed to do.

While I am reasonably sure that the public will not buy it, I am 100 per cent positive that the provincial premiers will not step gracefully aside and allow a newly elected Senate to fill all or any of their self-appointed roles as saviours of Canada's regions. Those televised federal-provincial conferences with Pierre, Brian, John, or whoever, billed in each provincial capital as the bad guy, and Bill, René, Peter, or whoever, billed as the good guy, are Canada's answer to the day-time soap operas, and I do not think our fearless premiers will step aside in favour of newly-elected senators, thereby giving up all that national exposure plus the side trips to New York. That is not very likely. However, a new, more powerful House of Commons group might steal some of their thunder.

Honourable senators, you may have gathered by now that I do not believe in an elected Senate. Let me make it clear, however, that this is not personal. By the time we get to the stage of having an elected Senate—if we ever do—I shall be too old to walk, never mind run, so I am now announcing I shall not be a candidate. If I ever changed my mind and by some fluke was elected, my wife Eunice would probably demand a re-count.

However, I do believe that Senate reform is imminent and should take place, and I support that part of the report in chapter 7 entitled, "Reforms That Should Be Made Now". As you know, this covers the selection of senators, with possibly some input from new sources and a better balance between political parties. I would even go so far as to agree that some NDP members should be appointed to the Senate. However, if they refused, I would not be brokenhearted.

I would point out that our present prime minister has probably appointed more independent senators and opposition members than all other prime ministers in history combined, but I agree that more could be done. Our powers should be changed, and the report's proposal to have a suspensive veto of 120 days has, I am sure, much support in the Senate. Many of us have supported a change in our internal organization to give the Senate the opportunity to elect some of its officers. Consistently, more staff has been asked for and just as consistently refused.

I would like to see the Senate given more power to investigate and more funds to carry out its work. Many tasks now given to royal commissions could be done as well, or even better, by a Senate committee at great saving to the taxpayers. I would like to see a Senate committee set up with the responsibility and power to look into the operations of our crown corporations. These crown corporations have become mega-businesses and some of them are almost a law unto themselves. If crown corporations were forced to come before a committee of the Senate to answer for their actions, it would have a salutary effect and would be a wonderful sight to behold.

I like the proposal put forward in the last chapter of the report, which says, in effect, "make these and other obviously good changes now, and then see if the Senate is worth saving or needs a total overhaul."

I sincerely believe that to bring in an elected Senate would be to open a Pandora's box that we would all regret in the years ahead. Senator Eugene Forsey, in a debate on this subject, cautioned us always to remember that the Senate, as presently constituted, does much good and very little harm. He warned us that change without careful consideration would reverse our record: we could end up doing little good and much harm to a parliamentary system that, with all its weaknesses, has brought our nation a long way in just over 100 years.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE
CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Molson calling the attention of the Senate to certain activities of the National Film Board and, in particular, to the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise in support of the motion by Senator Molson, who related, in well-defined terms, his concern over the film produced by the National Film Board entitled "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".

The producer of this film, without any feeling of conscience, perversely distorts a segment of military history and purposely sets out to degrade the record of a military hero for no other reason than to trail along the path of some of those in authority who want to tear down what few traditions we cling to as Canadians in trying to hold dear a sense of pride in our country.

● (1600)

There is not much point in repeating the strong case laid out so adequately by Senator Molson, but I have risen to support his sensible suggestion that the Senate should ask the minister responsible to direct the National Film Board to withdraw the film from circulation immediately and to show some common sense in the future.

I am really surprised that this has not been done already. I feel it is incumbent on the Acting Leader of the Government to tell us today what action he has taken to comply with the request made by Senator Molson on February 7. Surely, he has had enough time. Surely, this travesty of public relations tactics holds the same kind of urgency that made the Minister of National Revenue comply with a request in the other place to cancel a $200,000 film found unworthy of being shown to the Canadian public. Surely, we are not so impotent in this chamber that our leadership cannot prevail on the government to correct the wrong done by one of its agencies, whose job is supposed to be to enhance the feelings of Canadians towards their country or, indeed, as in this case, towards those of distinction.

On a recent visit with the Senate defence committee to Air Command Headquarters in Winnipeg, I was struck with some emotion at the performance of our young airmen and women; they serve our country with a dedication and pride that is heartwarming to behold. Part of that dedication is due to the fact that they hold dear the history and record of those gallant airmen who gave their lives during World War II.

One such record, apart from Billy Bishop's, is that of the late Pilot Officer Andrew Charles Mynarski, who was awarded the highest honour for bravery, the Victoria Cross. He was killed in air combat over Cambrai, France, in a gallant effort to rescue his comrades who were trapped in the tail turret of their plane.

While I hesitate even to mention this incident, should we not now be wondering whether the National Film Board is looking at other records of bravery of Canadians who have fought for our country? I hope not, honourable senators. Those new pilots located in Winnipeg hold in esteem people such as Billy Bishop and Pilot Officer Mynarski. I hope that we can rest assured that the showing of this film will be stopped at once, as Senator Molson has requested so very properly. I hope that the government will listen to us in this regard.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate. I should point out, for the benefit of anyone who might wish to speak before me, that I do not intend to speak for another week or so.

The reason for the delay is that I have been in touch with a member of the National Film Board—with whom I have no particular influence, but who has been amenable to reason in the past, and I refer to my son—who assures me that the acting commissioner of the National Film Board is looking into this matter. I will give him about another week to take action; if no action is taken, I will speak then.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 23, 1984, at 2 p.m.

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your Committee wishes to draw to the attention of both Houses the correspondence annexed to this Report.

For the reasons mentioned in its letter of March 18, 1983, to the President of the Treasury Board, your Committee renews its request to be designated pursuant to Section 75 of the Access to Information and Privacy Acts.

The Honourable Herb Gray, P.C., M.P.
President,
The Honourable the Treasury Board,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Gray:

Re: Access to Information Act and Privacy Act

We thank you for your letter of December 21, 1982 in which you indicate the Privacy Act is to be proclaimed in force on April 1, 1983. This, and the likely proclamation of the Access to Information Act in the not too distant future, prompted a discussion in Committee with regard to Section 75 of these Statutes which allow for the establishment of Parliamentary Review Committees with a permanent mandate to review the administration of the Acts.

Members of the Joint Committee believe that our Committee should be designated under Section 75 of the Access to Information and Privacy Acts and have requested us to seek your support to this end. The Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments has a long history of involvement in the areas of freedom of information and protection of privacy, going back to 1973, when the 'Guidelines for Motions for the Production of Papers', tabled in the House of Commons by the President of the Privy Council, were referred to it by that House. This Order of Reference was renewed in 1974, when the subject matter of Bill C-225, an Act respecting the right of the public to information concerning the public business, was also referred to our Committee. Finally, starting in early 1978, the Joint Committee studied the government's Green Paper on Legislation on Public Access to Government Documents' and issued a Report thereon in June of that year.

We consider the fact that both the Senate and the House of Commons are represented on our Committee, and the Committee's well-established tradition of non-partisanship, to be additional factors which militate in favour of the solution we propose.

For these reasons, we think the Joint Committee is in an excellent position to fulfill the mandate described in Section 75 of the Access to Information and Privacy Acts and we hope that, as the Minister responsible for the administration of these Statutes, you will support our views in this matter.

Yours sincerely,

Subject: Access to Information Act and Privacy Act

K1A 0A4

Dear Sirs:

Thank you for your letters of March 18, 1983 and May 12, 1983 in which you expressed the views of the Members of the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments that your committee should be designated as the Parliamentary Review Committee with a mandate to review the administration of the Access to Information and Privacy Acts.

The Statutory Instruments Act makes clear that the Joint Committee's responsibility is to evaluate the acceptability of the form of proposed statutory instruments. To expand so substantially the mandate of your committee would run counter to the purpose for which it was originally set up. Moreover, such an expansion would jeopardize your committee's ability to fulfill its primary mandate as successfully as it has to date.

While a review of the circumstances surrounding the cases cited in your letter suggests that in each case there were good reasons for making an exception to the rule about your committee's mandate, these cases remain exceptions. It would not be appropriate in my view given the concern expressed above to suggest that another such exception should be made. The Acts, when they were last before the House, were referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs after Second Reading because it was thought to be the most appropriate committee. I believe that it is still the appropriate committee.

Yours sincerely,
YVON PINARD,

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE IN CANADA

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which was authorized by the Senate on January 19, 1984, to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc., be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada for the purpose of such inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this notice of motion, as it appears on the scroll, deals with the intention of the committee to move from place to place. Would the mover please tell us whether it is the intention of the committee to do something between now and March 6 that would make it desirable to give leave this morning? If he has a good reason, then we will be prepared to listen to it; otherwise, perhaps it could be postponed until March 6 and dealt with in the regular way.

Senator Langlois: I have no objection to postponing it because we do not intend to meet outside of Ottawa before March 6 and possibly even later in the month.

Senator Roblin: In that case, perhaps we could deal with it on March 6.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is what I was going to suggest, so let us do it.

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO REVIEW

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to review all aspects of the National Energy Program, including its effects on energy development in Canada;

That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada for the purposes of this review; and

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the above-mentioned purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether or not consistency is a virtue. In view of the fact that leave was asked for and granted on this particular motion and not granted with respect to others, I think my colleagues and I owe an explanation to the house why this is the case. It is because we are informed that this committee actually intends to begin its work, under these terms of reference, between now and March 6. Therefore, there is a very good reason for granting leave and allowing this committee to proceed with its labours.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN YOUTH

MOTION TO APPOINT SENATE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Jacques Hébert, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 44(1)(d), moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues facing Canadian youth between fifteen and twenty-four years of age;

That the Committee be composed of twelve Senators to be designated at a later date;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 1, 1985.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am afraid we must ask the mover why he thinks he should be given leave today. This is a motion which will certainly require substantial consideration since it calls for the establishment of a new committee. Therefore, it does not seem to me to be a motion which has as its intent doing anything between now and March 6. Unless the honourable senator does not find it convenient to move his motion on March 6, or he has another reason which he would like to explain, I wonder whether it should be proceeded with now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I say that, if leave were granted to present this motion, it would not be our intention to ask for a vote or even to attempt to conclude debate on it today. Senator Hébert may correct me if I am wrong, but I believe he does have a problem regarding being here on March 6. Therefore, it should be understood that, if leave were granted, we would hear his explanation in support of the motion, and then adjourn its consideration.

Senator Roblin: Speaking to the point of order, if my friend tells me that he has a good reason for seeking leave, we shall certainly give it consideration. Otherwise, I must stick to the rules, in company with Senator McElman and a few others.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, I think that my reasons for asking the Senate's leave will become clear in the short speech I intend to make—only ten minutes!—which will explain the urgency of this matter.

I do not know the Rules well enough to be sure they allow me to take a few minutes of your time to set forth my reasons for proposing this motion.

[English]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We agree, subject to the condition mentioned by the deputy leader that there would be an adjournment.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, at this very moment I envy the eloquence and power of persuasion of some of my colleagues here in the Senate today, and I regret that I lack this power to persuade and to reach both heart and mind.

Senator Flynn: We shall see!

Senator Hébert: And I shudder at the thought of failing to win the full support of each one of you for this motion, the first I have had the honour to present before this Chamber.

I shall do my best, however, and if I fail, I shall come back until I succeed in communicating my compassion for the truly unfortunate situation of youth in the 80s.

Like aspirants to the Académie française who must see each member of the Academy to argue their case, I promise, if necessary, to meet each of my honourable colleagues and try to persuade them that the motion presented today is no ordinary motion. If it is passed, it would help us exert considerable influence on the future of our country and change the course of events, which may well be the noblest mission of any politician worthy of the name.

First of all, allow me to recall some points I mentioned previously in my inaugural speech last December.

[English]

If I was a young man today, I would have to admit that this great country of ours, while rich and well developed, fails to provide employment to more than a million Canadians, half of them young people.

I do not pretend that unemployment is the sole cause for anxiety among today's youth; there are many other causes. For example: to begin life with the ever-present anguish of a nuclear conflict which would jeopardize the future of mankind itself; to be the helpless witness of the wasting of natural resources, the destruction of the environment, the population boom in Third World countries where already a third of the people are literally starving to death; to be constantly confronted with violence which erupts almost every day in some corner of the world.

No, unemployment is not the sole cause for anxiety among today's youth.

However, while it is a tragedy for any individual to be unable to find a job when one wants to work, it is a much more serious problem for a young person, who feels rejected, useless, unneeded, and this, at the very time he or she tries to become integrated within society.

In these circumstances, it should not come as a surprise to us if, out of sheer frustration, a number of young people turn to a life of crime or stupefying addiction to alcohol and drugs.

[Translation]

For many young Canadians between fifteen and twenty-four, the first labour market experience is unemployment. Many have nothing to offer a prospective employer, no job experience, not enough education, and such skills as they have acquired are becoming obsolete. During their formal education and even afterwards, they have no idea what kind of job opportunities will be available.

During the last two decades—

—writes Kevin Kerr, a researcher, in an excellent study dated January 24 of this year,

—youth unemployment (15 to 24 years old) increased by 13 percentage points, while the number of workers in the same age group increased by less than 6½ per cent. In 1981, this group represented a little over one quarter of the labour force and about 46 per cent of the unemployed in this country.

Since 1981, the situation has improved somewhat. In January 1983, “in real terms, 2,155,000 jobs were held by young people (1,409,000 full time and 705,000 part time), which means an increase of 59.8 per cent in relation to the total number of jobs.”

At first glance, these figures would seem encouraging, but the truth is that youth unemployment is still at a much higher level than it was before the recession.

The present level is simply intolerable. If we accept it without taking drastic action right away, we will be sacrificing an entire generation. What this means for the future—

In recent years, and especially in recent months, the Government has increased the number of programs aimed at fighting unemployment among young people, and it has spent a considerable part of the Budget on such programs. There are those who claim it is not enough. However, everybody knows that in order to reduce by half, or even by one quarter, the present unemployment rate among young people, it would be necessary to invest huge sums of money, which means increasing an already considerable deficit and thus running the risk of causing an inflationary spiral and unsettling our still shaky economic recovery.

In that case, is there no solution at all?

Honourable senators, allow me to say I do not believe that. Solutions will not be easy to find, but they do exist, and I am convinced that a Special Committee of the Senate would be able to stimulate the imagination of many Canadians who, like us, are alarmed at the proportions of this social calamity, Canadians who are merely waiting for an opportunity to express their views.

[English]

Of course, it is hard to see how even the total combined efforts of the federal and provincial governments together with the private sector could, in the short term, find jobs for the approximately 506,000 unemployed Canadians aged 15 to 24. Older or experienced workers are the first to be hired, as we know, while these young Canadians, either lacking experience or being qualified in areas no longer in demand, are the last to be hired.

Yes, we should try to find real jobs for as many of them as possible. We should train them more and give them a better chance to find decent jobs when they again become available.

[Senator Hébert.]

But it also seems to me very important that the government enable young people who are interested—and there are tens of thousands of them—to serve their community through non-governmental agencies that can use young volunteers.

We can never repeat too often that it is not in school that young people get their ideas about politics and society. They develop them from strong, concrete human experiences in a surrounding which is open, real and where they can share responsibilities with other young people in co-operation with grown-ups. This is why it is necessary that young people be presented with projects that are fine and noble and which call upon their generosity and enthusiasm, and to suggest effective means for them to become useful and complete citizens.

When we speak of youth, naturally we are speaking of Canada's future. This is so vitally important that I am prepared to beg my honourable colleagues on both sides of this house to react favourably to this motion and to ensure that not one day will be lost in setting up the committee.

[Translation]

I realize that matters relating to youth come under the terms of reference of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, but it seems to me that the scope of the study proposed in my motion would justify creating a separate special committee rather than a sub-committee. Furthermore, it would be a splendid gesture, received with even greater enthusiasm by Canadian youth and by the general public.

Honourable senators, if by some miracle, each one of us could imagine for one instant the disappointment, humiliation, frustration, anxiety and even despair, experienced daily and often for years, by hundreds and thousands of young Canadians, I would not have to argue their case one minute longer!

I know that many senators are busy with, and concerned by, other problems that are important to the future of this country. But I am also convinced that not one of my colleagues would hesitate to endorse a motion that would not only bring some hope into the lives of an entire generation on the brink of despair, but also give the Senate a chance to show once again it is capable of taking a major problem, examining it thoroughly and proposing solutions that are both imaginative and sound.

Honourable senators, allow me to let my enthusiasm conclude this speech on the inevitable lyrical plane: By creating this Special Committee on Youth, the Senate, so often criticized in this day and age, will be able to show it still can be Canada's conscience.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 6, 1984, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

FRENCH PARLIAMENTARIANS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence in our Gallery of two visitors from France: Senator Adolfe Chauvin, a long-time expert in France-Canada relations—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: —and Madame Véronique Niertz, the Seine-Saint-Denis Member of the French National Assembly.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: On your behalf, I extend to them our warmest welcome and I hope that after following our proceedings, they will realize that we are looking after the interests of all Canadians.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

JUSTICE

WRONGFUL IMPRISONMENT—CIVIL LIABILITY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I asked a question on November 17 last, in the last session, which has not yet been answered. Needless to say, if I do not repeat the question it will remain unanswered.

My question is for the Acting Leader of the Government and relates to the Don Marshall case in Nova Scotia. Does the Department of Justice have a legal opinion on the question of civil liability when a person is wrongfully convicted by a federally-appointed judge, albeit in a provincial court room in a justice system administered by the province? In the event of an error, has it assessed where civil liability lies?

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that subject has been raised in the other place and, certainly, the interest in it has not died. I will try to get up-to-date information.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—PORT OF ST. JOHN'S—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government. A couple of mornings ago, while watching Canada AM, I saw Mr. James McGrath, the member for St. John's East, who was complaining because the two constituencies of St. John's had not received any grants or assistance under the small harbours legislation.

My question is whether or not that magnificent harbour of St. John's qualifies as a small harbour and is, therefore, eligible for such a grant.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You should write to Mr. McGrath if you want to engage in a debate with him.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no intention of describing St. John's Harbour as a small harbour, for any purpose. However, I shall try to find out if there is any technical reason or wording relating to this question of grants to small harbours and to St. John's Harbour.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, for the sake of the record, I should say that St. John's Harbour is certainly not the harbour to which the Honourable James McGrath was referring. There are literally hundreds of harbours in St. John's East and St. John's West, which fishermen use to ply their trade. These are the harbours that are in need of assistance under the small harbours legislation and that are not getting them because they are Tory districts.

Senator Frith: I will take both of those comments as notice.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the reply to a question asked by Senator Tremblay about regional development agreements. The information is as follows: Economic and regional development agreements (ERDA's) have already been signed by the federal Government and the Province of Manitoba on the one hand and the federal Government and the Province of Saskatchewan on the other hand. Negotiations are under way with the other Canadian Provinces with a view to having an ERDA signed with each one of them. The federal Government hopes to have these ERDA's signed in the near future.

With respect to the discussions with the Quebec Government, the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development, Mr. Johnston, has already met Mr. Gendron and Mr. Parizeau, and the officials of both levels of Government have also met to discuss the agreement. Mr. Johnston is expected to have another meeting in the near future with his Quebec counterparts to resume negotiations.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—LIST OF PROJECTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regarding a question asked by Senator

Phillips on February 7, 1984, concerning a list of projects approved under the Special Employment Initiatives Program, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has provided me with a comprehensive list of over 50,000 projects approved for funding under the Government of Canada's job stimulation program, including the list of special employment initiatives projects.

With leave, I now table, in response to Senator Phillips' question, two copies of:

Comprehensive list of projects approved for funding under the Government of Canada job stimulus programs including a list of special employment initiative projects, being a reply to Senator Phillips' question of February 7, 1984.—Sessional Paper No. 322-82.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask my honourable friend whether this is the material that was tabled with such éclat in the other place?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I did not see it tabled. I have heard the word "éclat"—or a synonym of it—applied to the way in which it was tabled there. I intend to table the material as modestly as possible. Whether that comes up as understatement in the form of éclat, we will see, but I will say that I have no ribbons, just the material.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend's modest attitude is most becoming, in the circumstances.

Senator Frith: The accomplishments speak for themselves. That is why I am trying to be as "éclat-less" as possible. As a matter of fact, honourable senators will notice that, rather than being wrapped with ribbon, the packages are wrapped in plain brown paper.

Senator Roblin: The wrapping suits the contents; there is no doubt about that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Discretion is the better part of valour.

Senator Frith: We are sorry if these 50,000 items of good news turn out to be bad news for anyone.

BRITISH COLUMBIA INDIAN CUT-OFF LANDS SETTLEMENT BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Paul Lucier moved the third reading of Bill C-18, to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (JUAN ANDRADE AND EMILIA RODRIGUEZ)—SECOND READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-6, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Juan Andrade and Emilia Rodriguez.

He said: Honourable senators, on February 2, 1984, in this chamber, I moved second reading of Bills S-2 to S-5 inclusive. In speaking to Bill S-3, I reviewed for you the state of the law in Canada with respect to prohibitions against marriage between related persons. In particular, I underlined for you that, in this area, only Parliament is competent to act. Each of Bills S-2 to S-5 would exempt from the law prohibiting marriage a couple related by consanguinity. Bill S-6, which I address today, would exempt from the law prohibiting marriage a couple related by affinity.

Juan Andrade and Emilia Rodriguez are related as brother-in-law and sister-in-law, she being the sister of his divorced wife, Maria Rodriguez. As early as 1882, Parliament amended the law in order to permit marriage between a widower and his sister-in-law. However, the wording of the amendment reflected the social reality of the time. As such a marriage would clearly depend upon the prior termination of the first marriage, the amendment was worded to allow the marriage only in the event of the death of the man's wife. The amendment is still with us in that form in the Marriage Act today. In the intervening period, however, social reality has changed and divorce has become almost as common a cause for the termination of a marriage as death.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that when the law conditions the capacity of two persons to marry on the death of a third person who is a sister to one and a former wife to another, the law creates a most unhealthy family situation. I can see no reason why, when the law expressly allows a man to marry the sister of his deceased wife, and when it subsequently expressly allows a man to divorce his wife, it does not carry through to the logical conclusion and allow him to marry the sister of his divorced wife. I suggest that it should.

The question of an amendment to the public general law on this issue is already before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs by virtue of the subject-matter reference of February 9. My motion today is that one particular couple be not kept waiting while the committee does the in-depth study that must always precede an amendment to the public general law. I move that this private Bill be read a second time and sent to committee so that it may be disposed of and the couple sent on their way expeditiously.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Leblanc. I am in no way objecting to Bill S-6, which you mentioned earlier, being referred to committee.

As you know, Bills S-2 and S-5 were considered in committee yesterday. This makes a total of four Bills in addition to the two referred this morning. Could you tell me if you anticipate introducing additional petitions of this nature?

Senator Leblanc: Two petitions were tabled today. They will then become Bills. We shall be receiving two more later on. I think that this completes the present list, but I could be wrong. At the second reading stage of Bill S-3, I announced that additional petitions were being considered in the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel's office.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to add one thing. Senator Leblanc has explained that the general law is defective. Of course, this is what the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs must consider. I see no problem in referring Bills S-6 and S-7 to committee.

Once again, all the arguments raised to support this series of private Bills are in favour of amending the general law. The Committee will decide whether this Bill must be dealt with differently from those now before it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (HENRI PATRY AND ALDÉA BÉA PITT)—SECOND READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-7, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Henri Patry and Aldéa Béa Pitt.

He said: Honourable senators, the petitioners, Henri Patry and Aldéa Pitt, are related as brother-in-law and sister-in-law, he being the brother of her divorced husband, Rosaire Patry. Honourable senators have heard me speak to Bill S-6; the considerations relating to Bill S-7 are, in my view, identical.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention and commend my motion to you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—
(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have had consultations with my leader and I have an indication that I hope will not disappoint my colleagues. Since I will not have time, because of Royal Assent, to conclude my remarks, and will not even get to "secondly"—and we all know that "fifthly" is the most important one—I propose to keep this speech to my bosom for another week. Therefore, I ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on February 21, 1984.

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, this report is exactly the same as previous reports from this committee adopted by the Senate, with one exception. Before this report the provision was that a quorum be five members for votes and three members for hearing evidence. Because of the rule established by Senate committees that a quorum be four for votes, owing to the fact that we have run into difficulty in the past trying to get a quorum of five and since the committee operates on the consensus and understanding that, if there is any dispute, it will not be solved until a reasonable number of the members are present, the committee is recommending that the quorum be four rather than five. Otherwise, this report follows the reports of the past.

I would like to take this opportunity to talk a bit about the committee and I would like to point out some of the 15 criteria provided for in the mandate of the committee. The first one is that the committee must decide whether or not regulations are ultra vires. Eight of the balance of the criteria deal with human rights, so, really, other than the first criterion dealing with ultra vires, the committee's most important job is human rights. Out of these urgent criteria I would cite three by way of illustration. The fifth one states that the committee must decide whether or not the regulation trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject. In the eighth one the committee must determine whether the regulation appears for any reason to infringe the rule of law or the rules of natural justice. The thirteenth one states that the committee must determine whether the regulation is in conformity with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Human rights is a particular interest of mine. I was deeply disappointed that the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform did not emphasize the role the Senate could play in this area, a role which is played very actively and vigorously by the Australian Senate, as I have pointed out on numerous occasions in the past. It does not matter whether the Senate is appointed or elected, it should take a particular interest in this area. If we took a stand on the subject of human and civil rights in any bill, we would have sufficient political support that the government would pay attention to us. I think a perfect example of that was the bill on gating that came before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and Senator Nurgitz will remember it. There was a provision that permitted the gating of prisoners on the recommendation of the Parole Board. But on the basis of civil rights the committee insisted that the Parole Board be required to go before a court to have any recommendation or decision to gate approved. We dug in our heels. Originally, the minister was not prepared to accept such a proposal, but when we dug our heels in he accepted it and proposed the appropriate amendment.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Then he let the bill die.

Senator Godfrey: In any event, we got our way because it was a question of human rights and because the minister knew, and we knew, that we would have the support of the public.

On the same subject, I must confess my disappointment at failing so far to attain something where the Australian Senate has led the way. Last February 9, I proposed a motion in which I said that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments should look at bills to determine whether or not they offend the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and should draw to the attention of the committee dealing with the bill the possibility that it so offends it. I did not get very far as I was not able to persuade the powers that be. However, it was suggested to me that, instead of the Regulations and other Statutory Instrument Committee being given this power, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee should be given the power and that it would have more chance of being accepted. I spoke to the chairman of the committee, Senator Neiman. She was very enthusiastic about the idea and moved a motion to replace the motion I had moved on May 24. I was prepared to withdraw my motion, but there was some objection and through a technicality it remained on the Order Paper. We will celebrate tomorrow the anniversary of the ninth month since Senator Neiman gave notice of that motion, but of course, she never actually got around to moving it and the motion died at the end of the last session. Since then nothing has been done. I have continued gently to prod Senator Neiman, asking her what she was going to do about it. Her enthusiasm seemed to wane and nothing happened. Here again is an area in which we can find all sorts of precedents in the Australian Senate that indicate that we should do exactly the same thing.

● (1150)

I have another example in the field of human rights where no action has been taken. On April 21 I made a motion in connection with enabling clauses of bills. At that time I pointed out that a cabinet directive had been approved on April 16, 1981, stating that departments should observe that care is taken to ensure that the statute is not couched in unnecessarily wide terms with respect to regulation-making powers. The following was also stated:

Specifically, certain powers are not to be granted unless the Memorandum to the Cabinet requesting the authority for preparation of the legislation by which such a power would be conferred specifically requests authority for the power and contains reasons justifying the power that it sought. These powers include the following:

(a) power to make regulations that might substantially affect personal rights and liberties;

My motion was adjourned by Senator Langlois on the request of Senator Frith, I believe, and nothing happened with respect to it.

I am using this occasion to point out that, so far as I am concerned, I still have hopes that I may be successful in this respect. Obviously, I lack the talent of persuasion of Senator Missen, who proposed the motions in the Australian Senate that I have referred to and who was magnificently successful where I have failed miserably.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Senator Godfrey, as co-chairman of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, did you try to convince the members of that committee of the advantage of having regard to any clauses of the Bill of Rights that would not be protected in some bills we receive? Do you not think this joint committee should be the device to achieve this end? You have already explained that you have a tradition and so forth. What objection is there to the members of your committee doing precisely the job you would like the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to do?

Senator Godfrey: The members of my committee are very eager to do the job. I was told that the powers that be were frowning upon it. As far as I am concerned, I want the job to be done no matter which committee does it. I happen to think that the Regulations Committee can do the best job since on its staff are two lawyers who look into regulations to determine whether or not they offend the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In fact, what I proposed to Senator Neiman was that, if her committee took on this job, then it could use the lawyers from our committee to do the detail work. No senator has the time to go through all the bills to see whether there might be infringements to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We must rely on staff to do the digging and to draw possible infringements to our attention. Then we can make a decision after they have reported to us. I even spoke to the Minister of Justice about my proposal and he seemed to think it was a good idea that the staff of our committee be used by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. However, nothing has happened.

Since there is no point in pursuing the matter further with the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, what I propose to do is to reintroduce my original motion and ask that the joint committee be given this power. I am not giving formal notice of that motion today; I will be doing that in the coming weeks.

Senator Deschatelets: As far as I can see, having your joint committee deal with this aspect of the Bill of Rights would permit it to act at the beginning when a bill is introduced. If you give this matter to our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, we will then have to wait until the bill is passed in the Commons before it reaches us here for approval. That is why I think you should do your best to convince your colleagues on the joint committee to add this aspect to the work you are doing.

Senator Godfrey: In fact, the notice given by Senator Neiman provided that the committee look into the matter immediately—that is, any bill introduced in either the Senate or the House of Commons. Therefore, there would be no particular advantage to our committee looking after this issue.

I wish to emphasize again, honourable senators, that our committee would not in any way make a decision with respect to whether or not there are infringements. We would merely draw to the attention of the committee considering a bill whether or not there is a possibility of an infringement in order that it would not be overlooked. That is all I intend to do.

The Department of Justice takes the attitude that, since their officials look into this matter, we can rely on them. However, I still feel there should be some specific consideration by the legislative branch. Members of committees do not have the staff to look through all the fine print to determine whether or not there is some technical breach, or something else which could be an infringement with respect to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. You need staff for that purpose. My committee has the staff and we were prepared to lend it to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee. Since the chairman has shown no interest with respect to this matter, I will renew my motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to Senator Godfrey. I believe he mentioned in his comments that the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform had not considered the matter of statutory regulations.

Senator Godfrey: I was referring to human rights only. I attended one of the meetings of the Senate Reform Committee when Mr. MacGuigan, the Minister of Justice, was giving evidence. There was no mention of human rights as an area in which the Senate might take an interest, although Senator Frith in the speech he gave on Senate reform mentioned human rights as one of the five areas we should be interested in. Mr. MacGuigan did not think it was very important, and, obviously, neither did the committee, even though the Senate in Australia boasts about the fact that this is one of their main functions by which they can make a contribution.

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Godfrey phoned me before the proceedings commenced this morning. He told me he would be proposing a routine motion. He did not tell me he would be making a modern day Gettysburg address in its support. I take it that most of what he has said today is in support of the motion that will be coming forward in due course.

Senator Godfrey: That is right.

Senator Frith: However, what we are considering today is giving that committee exactly the powers it has had since time immemorial.

Senator Godfrey: That is right. I am using this opportunity to explain the functions of the committee.

Senator Frith: Then I support the motion.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on Tuesday, February 21, 1984.

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, the intention of this report is to draw to the attention of the Senate and to the House of Commons a request made by our committee in March of last year. A copy of a letter to the Honourable Herb Gray and his reply appears in the report. The request was made under section 5 of the Access to Information and Privacy Acts. We pointed out in the letter to Mr. Gray that the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has a long history of involvement in the areas of freedom of information and protection of privacy going back to 1973, when the "Guidelines for Motions for the Production of Papers" were tabled in the House of Commons by the President of the Privy Council and were referred to it by that house.

The order of reference was then renewed in 1974, when the subject matter of Bill C-225, respecting the right of the public to information concerning the public business, was also referred to our committee.

Bill C-225 was a private bill of Mr. Jed Baldwin, whom we all recognize as the father of freedom of information. Mr. Baldwin was a member, and subsequently the joint chairman, of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

● (1200)

The government then issued a green paper on freedom of information and, starting in early 1978, the joint committee studied the government's green paper on legislation on public access to government documents and issued a report in June of that year. I might say, in connection with that study, that we spent three days in Washington, and, as a result of that trip, I returned to Canada thoroughly sold on the subject of freedom of information. Thereafter, the committee took a very strong stand against the implied recommendations of the government contained in that green paper with respect to whether or not such matters would be appealed through the courts.

After that trip to Washington, I became very concerned about the amount of litigation that was going on in the United States, and I proposed that we have an information officer interposed between the decision-making of the minister and the courts. In that way, the information officer, without any real authority, could resolve at least 95 per cent of the disputes, but there would still be an ultimate appeal to the courts. I personally debated the issue on various public platforms with government representatives and others at such gatherings as Canadian Bar Association meetings and so on.

The former Liberal government was not prepared to accept the idea of an appeal to the courts. However, when the Conservative government came in the Honourable Walter Baker, who was a member of our committee, sponsored the first bill in which the Conservatives adopted the idea of having an information officer with an ultimate appeal to the courts, and that was approved. Finally, the Liberal government went along with this when they introduced their bill.

With all our years of experience, and taking into account the enthusiasm displayed by some of our members, it seemed to me that our committee would be the obvious choice to study this matter. However, I received a letter from Mr. Yvon Pinard, dated September 13, 1983 in which he said:

To expand so substantially the mandate of your committee would run counter to the purpose for which it was originally set up. Moreover, such an expansion would jeopardize your committee's ability to fulfill its primary mandate as successfully as it has to date:

Honourable senators, all I can say to that is: Hogwash!

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): I am sure he feels the same way about you.

Senator Godfrey: I am not referring to Mr. Pinard personally, of course. I only hope he feels the same way about my arguments.

When I was first appointed to this committee, we met every other Thursday morning and Thursday afternoon at 3.30 p.m. In fact, I was criticized by some of my fellow senators because it was noticed that I disappeared from this chamber at 3.25 p.m. on Thursdays and they thought that I was heading for the airport. In fact, I was heading for Room 112-N for a meeting of the regulations committee.

During the years when we were considering freedom of information we would sit on Tuesday evenings, and we had no difficulty handling both. Now, since we have become more expert on these questions, our meetings progress much more quickly, particularly when we do our homework ahead of time. I, personally,—and Mr. Perrin Beatty, the joint chairman and others—do about one inch of reading before each meeting. Because of all of these things, we are in the situation now where we only meet every other Thursday morning, so that we have all the time in the world to undertake this job.

I know that we are not very popular with the government, and for a very good reason. The sole task of our committee—and the only time we issue a report—is to criticize the government.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Frith does not like that at all.

Senator Godfrey: Having said that, I would not want anyone to think that we are only effective when we criticize the government. We find some of the departments very co-operative. I would say that 60 or 70 per cent of the time we negotiate a satisfactory settlement with a department. However, even though we have no actual powers, every now and again we do tread rather heavily on the toes of the government. We have always operated on a completely non-partisan basis. In the ten or eleven years in which the committee has operated, we have had only two recorded votes when there was a dissent. We operate by consensus. I am therefore putting in a plug for our committee to be the one to consider this matter, as opposed to the overloaded Justice Committee in the House of Commons, which I understand would have difficulty finding the time to do this job.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Marshall's Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 stand, as does Motion No. 4. However, since we are adjourning, I would ask for leave to make a comment for the record on Motion No. 4.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: With respect to Senator Marshall's Motion No. 4, which reads:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine the ongoing effects of the restructuring of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada.

I advise honourable senators that, when that motion comes forward, I shall move, in amendment, that the words "the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry" be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

A special committee to be named at a later date.

Therefore, when Senator Marshall moves his motion upon our return, what will be before us will be a decision as to whether the subject—which both Senator Marshall and I agree needs study—should be studied by a special committee or the named standing committee.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

---

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to provide for the settlement of claims by Indian bands in British Columbia relating to certain lands cut off from their reserves. (Bill C-18, Chapter No. 2)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 6, 1984, at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE H. A. OLSON, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that I am entitled to be the first to rise to say how pleased we are to see that our friend Senator Olson is over his affair of the heart and is back leading his army.

It would not be very macho for a couple of warriors to be comparing notes on their respective ailments. Suffice it to say that I am just as pleased to see that his plumbing job was a success as I was when I learned that my problem could be solved with a mere dose of Drano.

I am sure that the Leader of the Government has been advised by his physicians, as I have been by mine, not to allow himself to become too emotional over what transpires in this chamber. I am equally certain that the good senator plans to pay as much attention to those recommendations as I do. Therefore, the Senate can feel secure in the thought that our debates will henceforth be characterized by the epitome of calm and wise reflection. Not a provocative thought will we harbour and not a word will we utter in anger. When we are bored silly with all this care and reserve and when we have become so even-tempered that even our best friends do not recognize us, then the gloves will come off, the accusations will fly, the language will regain its colour and the Senate will again become that boisterous arena for the exchange of profound and exhilarating thoughts that it has always been.

I am certainly glad, Senator Olson, that we are both back, as the alternative was just too morbid to contemplate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to express my gratitude for and appreciation of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, which I know are absolutely genuine and sincere. I should also like to say how pleased I am to see him here in apparent good health. His condition can be described as being at least equal, if not superior, to the condition he appeared to be in when he had to be absent for some repairs. As a matter of fact, as I walked into the chamber today I heard it expressed that both of us seem to have recuperated even beyond the point we were at when we had to leave for a few days. That may sound facetious, but I am sincerely happy to see the Leader of the Opposition in that condition.

Honourable senators, I should like to say one or two other things about what has happened since November 24, the last day on which I was present in the chamber. I want to express my appreciation to all honourable senators on both sides of the house and, indeed, to many people outside this chamber for their many sincere, good wishes and prayers during the period I was in and out of hospital. I had never been through a period of illness and had certainly never been confined to hospital before, so it was a new experience for me. Such kind messages are an enormous help in the psychological situation one faces at such a time. I appreciate it very deeply.

I should also like to express my appreciation and gratitude to those of the medical profession at the National Defence Medical Centre and the Civic Hospital, where the medical, surgical and convalescent teams assisted me. Having taken a great deal of interest in cardiovascular problems and their correction, I seriously believe that the team we have in this city is among the best in the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I was most impressed by the manner in which other patients and I were treated. We can take a great deal of pride in the fact that today some of the leading technology available to people all over the world was developed right here in Canada. I am most appreciative of that.

Hon. Martial Asselin: We also have a good team in Quebec City.

Senator Flynn: They had to be!

Senator Olson: Of course, there are good teams in other centres, but I just wanted to acknowledge the excellence of the team in this city.

I also want to respond to the Leader of the Opposition by telling him that, while all that kindness is deeply appreciated, I do feel it one of my obligations to keep life interesting for the opposition. As soon as we can move to the stance the Leader of the Opposition indicated, which may be coming fairly soon, that will put both of us back into the rut we understand and we will be able to conduct ourselves accordingly.

In conclusion, I reiterate that I very much appreciate all the kind wishes I have received from honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Is the Leader of the Government aware that while he was away he was missed so much and the pressure became so great on the Prime Minister that he had to resign?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The Leader of the Government just happens to have his "music" with him!

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION AS LEADER OF THE LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Frith has just said, I happen to have my notes with me. I am not sure I agree with what Senator Marshall has just said, although this is the first time the Senate has met since the Prime Minister made the announcement that he had asked the President of the Liberal Party of Canada to make arrangements for a leadership convention. I need not go through the history of that, since the subject has been predominant in the media ever since.

I should like to make reference to what I believe many of you will agree has been one of the most turbulent periods in Canadian history. Much of that turbulence has indeed resulted in significant improvements in the Canadian economic and political structure.

As most honourable senators know, I was a member of the cabinet sworn in on July 6, 1968, immediately after the Prime Minister's election to the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada. Therefore, his career and mine have occupied the same era, although I was not in cabinet during the entire period.

Throughout the past 16 years, he has taken the lead in achievements that are extremely important to Canada—such as the patriation of the Constitution, which is something that various prime ministers and other responsible ministers had been trying to achieve for 57 or 58 years. I should also mention the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which resulted from the patriation of the Constitution. There are still some problems involved in its application, but it, too, represents the culmination of what had been attempted many times before.

• (1410)

Not all of the past 16 years have been pleasant. All honourable senators remember the crisis in Quebec in October 1970, which was, I think, handled in a way that indicated the kind of leadership this man could provide. Such leadership has also been demonstrated in other areas. We know, for example, that the Crow rate for grain out of western Canada had been examined for a long, long time by many governments and many people in the industry. It required a great deal of political courage to tackle that problem. Now the new measures are in place and everything is running smoothly.

I could go over a number of other matters, such as the referendum in Quebec—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yes, I would like to go over that, too.

Senator Olson: Yes, but there are many people in this country who believe that that was a tremendous achievement on the part of this Prime Minister and his government. I think it is also fair to say that, in such a turbulent period, there will always be intense feelings on both sides of a question. That does not make it any easier to solve, but it certainly is a tribute to the man's courage and determination that he would do what was in the best interests of the country. I doubt that we will find that kind of person soon again; perhaps Canada will not need that kind of person because those kinds of problems will not be facing us. In my view, however, he was the right person with the right attitude—the attitude required to deal with the situations that have arisen over the past 16 years.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to what Senator Olson has said in paying tribute to the Prime Minister of this country, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

To me, the accomplishment of his career has been to keep this country together under very difficult circumstances. Although there have been great differences of opinion on the language issue in the province of Manitoba in recent weeks—and, I say, regretfully, in my province of Saskatchewan—I believe there has been a change in the attitude of many, if not most, of the people towards the question of bilingualism and the use of the French language. In Saskatchewan there is a great deal of support for French language instruction in our schools. There is a great demand on the part of the parents to have their children enrolled in French immersion courses in school, and there has been a growing response to that demand.

Over the years the Prime Minister has stood firm in his support of social programs in Canada—programs that are the very fabric of this nation.

Honourable senators, I came into the cabinet as a member of the Senate. As I travel around this country and talk to people, one of the questions put to me is: Is it really possible for a senator to operate within the cabinet circle on any basis of equality with cabinet ministers who are members of the House of Commons? I believe the answer is yes. From my first experience in the cabinet as the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board dealing with the question of a partial grain embargo, the Prime Minister was extremely supportive of my recommendation that the partial grain embargo with regard to the Soviet Union should be lifted. It was lifted. Compensation was made and we went on to expand that market, as well as other markets, to the greatest quantities in history.

From the point of view of the people of Saskatchewan, there has been real recognition of some of the economic needs of that province—the Regina airport; Agrivision, a tremendous development for Saskatoon and Regina; the hydrology laboratory at Saskatoon and the biotechnology institute. But of all the areas in which progress has been made during my time in cabinet, I am most satisfied and pleased with the attitude of the Prime Minister and the government toward the co-operative movement in this country. There is growing recognition of its important place and its potential for an improved, expanded and meaningful role in economic and social development in the years ahead. As I see this recognition of the co-operative movement and its development within society, it is the development of a new attitude and a new method of economic production, innovation and delivery of services. A team of people with equal representation from the francophone and anglophone communities is being put together to review what has been done and to make recommendations on how the co-operative movement may serve Canada all the better in the years ahead. In this initiative the Prime Minister has been most supportive, as indicated by his role in the development of Co-enerco, the Co-op Energy Corporation of Canada.

The Prime Minister's peace initiative in recent weeks is paying great dividends to all mankind. I consider it a great privilege to have worked with Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I believe that he will go down in history as the greatest of our prime ministers.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I want to join with my cabinet colleagues—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Where is Senator Perrault?

Senator Austin:—on this occasion in saying a few words on the contributions of Prime Minister Trudeau to Canada. No prime minister, no political leader can be successful without a dream. In the case of Prime Minister Trudeau he had a dream for a united, tolerant and compassionate society in Canada. His dream was that we could be the best of societies in the world and that we must strive for that quality. In short, his dream was for a just society. History will decide how well he pursued his dream and what he accomplished for Canada.

For me, serving with him was an opportunity to serve that dream and to watch his brilliance and courage in executing it. I will remember this period of service as a period of greatness on the part of the Canadians who joined with the Prime Minister in what he sought to do for Canada.

Hon. David Croll: Honourable senators, this is a historic occasion for Canada; certainly a momentous one for the Liberal Party and for those of us who have loyally supported the Prime Minister for over 16 years. I was one of three senators—the others being Senator Fournier, who is no longer with us, and Senator Cook—

● (1420)

Senator Asselin: But Senator Cook is no longer with the same party.

Senator Croll:—who supported the Prime Minister when he ran for office.

I feel I was ever so right. History will confirm the view I held then—one which I still hold. I have served under six prime ministers; I have an opinion of each. My views about them are strong and definitive. I liked Louis St. Laurent and Lester Pearson and to them I now add Prime Minister Trudeau: they are the charmed three.

Prime Minister Trudeau had a much more difficult task than the others and he did an excellent job. He worked hard. He will long be remembered for his attainments. He brought excitement and new values to the political life of this country.

He left his mark on the scene: The Constitution and the Charter of Rights. He welcomed minorities and he understood native people, and there are other matters he gave his attention to, but this is not the occasion to go into them. Moreover, he demonstrated that Quebec belongs in Canada, which is not a bad legacy. He showed us that Canada belongs to Canadians politically and economically. He did this, first, by bringing the Constitution to Canada and, then, by bringing about a greater measure of economic independence in this country.

I speak for myself, and I speak for my friends across the country who think as I think, when I say that this country has gained from his leadership. We thank him and wish him the best.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know there are many senators who wish to speak, but I want to say something more about Prime Minister Trudeau the man.

As to his many accomplishments listed for us today, we know that some people do not agree with all of them. As a Liberal, everything in his record is something to be proud of. In many cases I have been inspired by these accomplishments. However, I know all Canadians do not agree with me—at least not now. Yet, these accomplishments are symptomatic of what I think most Canadians will agree with—Prime Minister Trudeau is a man of character with all of the qualities of a really great leader—a great outstanding leader of men; well educated; of superior intelligence; impeccably honest, and one whose ideas are inspiring, as Senator Austin has said. He is a person of exceptional strength and courage. His ability to lead has made most Canadians proud of their country, whether at home or abroad, and proud of the fact that a man of such exceptional qualities has led this country for so long.

For me, Prime Minister Trudeau has been an inspiration, as was Mr. Pearson, and a reason, a justification to engage in Canada's political life.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I would like to join with all of the senators who have preceded me in paying tribute to the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. His achievements and accomplishments have been very well articulated by those who have spoken before me and also by the media, so I do not intend to reiterate them.

However, I would like to draw attention to an accomplishment that has affected hundreds of thousands of Canadians, including myself in a very real way, and that is the policy of multiculturalism the Prime Minister announced on November 8, 1971. That policy, honourable senators, has made a large part of Canadian society feel really at home in Canada because it states to Canadians that people who are not of Anglo-Saxon or French origin do not have to shed their culture in order to feel that they are Canadians equal in every way.

Today we are witnessing in Manitoba some controversy over the official languages policy, which indicates to me that that policy is not yet universally accepted in this country. Also, we have seen that the multiculturalism policy, which is a natural offspring of bilingualism, is not yet universally accepted in this country. However, having travelled the length and breadth of this country during my tenure as chairman of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, I can say with a great deal of certainty that Canadian society today is much more understanding than it was prior to the enactment of the policy of multiculturalism.

[Translation]

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words in French. I think that everything has been said about Mr. Trudeau, and our tributes and admiration can only echo earlier testimonies from which stem two outstanding truths: the force of attraction of our Prime Minister has held in check the separatist movement in Quebec while at the same time it has given Canada a most enviable international standing.

● (1430)

Even his opponents acknowledge his extremely complex and original personality, his remarkable intelligence and culture, his amazing energy and tenacity. The ignorance, stupidity or bad faith displayed by many of his fellow Canadians have often exasperated him and prompted him to act with a casualness, to say the least, which only hypocrites have found shocking.

The same ignorance, the same stupidity and the same bad faith prompted Westerners to accuse him of abandoning the country to the "frogs", and Easterners of selling Quebec off to the Anglophones. The truth is that his vision of people and events has made the Canada of 1984, as Senator Bosa said earlier, an enlightened country with a much wider perspective and quite different from the Canada of 1968.

The impetus given to this country by Mr. Trudeau is irreversible, we believe, and those who are about to follow in his footsteps will certainly be able to succeed him, but perhaps not replace him.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if no one else wants to add to this eulogy of the Prime Minister, I shall say a few words to express the views of the Opposition in the Senate.

Earlier, I was pleased to be the first to rise and welcome Senator Olson. Now, I am almost happy to be the last or at least among the last to talk about the Prime Minister.

After listening to what has been said up to now, I still think it is far too early to make the kind of judgment I heard being made with respect to Mr. Trudeau.

First of all, he still has three months to run as Leader of the Liberal Party. His successor will not be chosen until June 16. As Prime Minister, he may still have four months, and if he cared to follow the example of MacKenzie King, he could remain Prime Minister until the fall, because Mr. St. Laurent was chosen in August and MacKenzie King did not step aside until November of the same year. Well, you never know. After all the delays and Mr. Trudeau's apparent reluctance to take a decision, one would almost think he really intended to run in the next election.

A lot can happen in three-and-a-half, four, five or six months. In the corridors of Parliament, there are rumours of a plan by Mr. MacEachen according to which the Government will bring about its own defeat, thus forcing an election before June 16 and practically making it impossible for Mr. Trudeau to decline to lead the Liberal Party once more in an early election.

This sounds a bit like the conspiracy in November and December 1979. He could very well be asked once again to make a sacrifice—

Hon. Louis Robichaud: It was not a plan, it was a coincidence.

Senator Flynn: I know all about coincidences in the Liberal Party, when it is a matter of holding on to power or getting back into power.

We must also consider all the decisions and statements the Prime Minister will take and make between now and the time he steps down and passes the crown to his successor.

We have seen some of his recent decisions. He is still making all kinds of appointments, and he is still making statements that reflect his love of controversy, like the one he made yesterday in Toronto, which was clearly designed to continue the controversy on bilingualism and to appropriate the issue for the Liberal Party.

After a few months, once his successor has taken up the leadership of the Liberal Party and the Government as well, for a few months until the elections, it will be easier to take a more detached view of his career. When I say detached, I am speaking not only for myself but for all of us. Not surprisingly, on the Government side and in the Liberal Party, which he has kept in power for fifteen years, and with all the people he has appointed here, their admiration knows no bounds. Meanwhile, I would not want my refusal to take part—I was going to say in this debate, because many of the comments heard today were debatable—my refusal to take part in this event to be interpreted as a change of heart with respect to the main policies of the Trudeau Government. I did not share, I do not share and I doubt I ever will share his vision of Canada. Earlier, someone said that he had kept Canada together, that he had kept Quebec within Confederation. That is one of the most popular myths in English Canada. It is being parroted right and left. Everyone seems to forget what the real situation is in Quebec and what it was when Mr. Trudeau came to power. It is my conviction that the way the present Prime Minister wanted to patriate the Constitution was a mistake. We have mentioned the others who never did, and there is not a single English-speaking Prime Minister who would have dared patriate the Constitution against the wishes of Quebec.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Against the wishes of the Government of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: You are wrong, there is that myth again. You do not know a thing about it. Have you forgotten that the Legislative Assembly, expressed its opposition to the constitutional resolution with 90 votes against 19?

Senator Frith: The National Assembly, not the Province of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: What more do you want?

Senator Frith: Be more specific.

Senator Flynn: I cannot be more specific, you have the Opposition and the Party in power. I realize there were a few dissenters.

Senator Frith: It does not necessarily reflect the views of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: I repeat, it is wrong to say that he kept Quebec inside Canada. When he took part in the Referendum campaign, I was there. I heard him promise Quebecers he would give them a new Constitution. However, they never expected that this new Constitution imposed by Mr. Trudeau would, instead of giving them further powers, remove some of their existing powers, especially the veto right they assumed they had always had until then.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: There never was a veto right.

Senator Flynn: I hear Senator Langlois grumbling. I have certainly not forgotten the speech in which he said that Quebec had been weakened as a result of the agreement reached in November 1981, which took away Quebec's veto right.

Senator Frith: That veto right had no legal existence.

Senator Flynn: I do not deny that the Prime Minister has accomplished a great deal. I have always supported bilingualism, provided it is not seen as the sole solution to Canada's problems. I supported bilingualism well before he did. When I entered Parliament in 1958, I proposed the kind of bilingualism he subsequently implemented. One thing is certain, as I said earlier, that Mr. Trudeau's Liberal Party has insisted on claiming it was their doing alone.

I said I did not agree with his methods. This applies not only to his methods in patriating the Constitution but also to many other instances where he allowed his love of controversy and confrontation to prevail.

I agree with the comments made regarding Mr. Trudeau's personality. I admire his lively intellect, his force of character, his discipline, his ability as a politician, and in connection with the latter, he has been very lucky, because without the support of the NDP in 1972 we would have forgotten him long ago. Without their support in 1979, we would not have had the events that occurred since 1980. He was very lucky.

Senator Robichaud: The definition of "luck" is: Preparation that meets with opportunity.

Senator Flynn: That may be, and there is no doubt that the Prime Minister is a lucky guy and an opportunist.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: It makes people jealous.

Senator Flynn: And there is a lot to be jealous about.

Senator Frith: He has a great deal of talent.

Senator Flynn: I admire him on that point, no doubt about that. I envy him, because, personally, I have worked hard as a politician to get recognition for my ideas, without very much success. He has used the Liberal Party to good advantage and the Liberal Party has used him. It will be very interesting to write the history of the Trudeau era, at some time in the future. Today, since I am not anxious to relive the last sixteen years, I merely wish to say to Mr. Trudeau that I admire his strong personality. He is a born leader. We have seen this with our own eyes, because nearly all his partisans have followed him blindly. Dissent has not been a frequent occurrence in the Liberal Party. He has had an exceptional career. He took great pleasure in exercising the powers conferred upon him, and that has been the basis for his success among the electorate and his success in keeping his Party together. Whether history judges him favourably or unfavourably, it will certainly record the time he spent in office as a unique and very important period.

Until then, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Opposition, I wish to extend our best wishes to him and to his children, in whatever activity he may wish to choose. He has always been lucky in finding a job that suited him, and I do not see why he would stop being lucky now.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, March 13, 1984, I will move:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF CLAUSES OF CERTAIN BILLS

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, March 13, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be authorized to examine the subject matter of clauses of bills introduced in the Senate or the House of Commons, where such clauses may, by express words or otherwise, bestow powers to make regulations upon a person or a rule-making authority which is couched in unnecessarily wide terms and contains the powers set forth in Paragraph 2 of Part 9 of the cabinet directive on the preparation of legislation approved on 16th April, 1981, the said Part 9 reading in part as follows:

"9. REGULATIONS

In the preparation of proposals for legislation, departments and agencies should observe the following principles respecting regulation-making powers:

(1) When bestowing the power to make regulations upon a person or a rule-making authority, care must be taken to ensure that the statute is not couched in unnecessarily wide terms.

(2) Specifically, certain powers are not to be granted unless the Memorandum to the Cabinet requesting the authority for preparation of the legislation by which such a power would be conferred specifically requests authority for the power and contains reasons justifying the power that is sought. These powers include the following:

- (a) power to make regulations that might substantially affect personal rights and liberties;
- (b) power to make regulations involving important matters of policy or principle;
- (c) power to amend or add to the enabling Act or other Acts by way of regulation;
- (d) power to make regulations excluding the ordinary jurisdiction of the Courts;
- (e) power to make specific regulations having a retrospective effect;
- (f) power to subdelegate regulation-making authority;
- (g) power by regulation to impose a charge on the public revenue or on the public other than fees for services;

(h) power to fix by regulation, rather than by the statute itself, the penalties for breach of a regulation."; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house thereof and to invite them to join with this house in the aforementioned action.

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which was authorized by the Senate on 23rd February, 1984, to examine the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1985, be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e):

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1984; and

That the Committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, March 8, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government which committees will be sitting tomorrow, and I want to lay particular emphasis on the fact that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs should be convened as soon as possible since, at its last sitting, the Committee decided that the Minister of Justice should appear before us and tell us whether he intends to propose amendments in relation to the exemptions from the general law on marriage which are now being considered by the Senate. The Committee made this decision, and we thought that the Minister of Justice could perhaps appear before us tomorrow and tell us whether he intends to amend the general law on marriage in connection with the exemptions which the Senate has been asked to approve so that we may know what will happen to those private Bills.

Again today, two more petitions were tabled and we have been told that we may be receiving another ten of them. Before we begin to discuss each Bill submitted to us asking for an exemption to the law on marriage, we would like to know whether the Minister intends to amend the general law to cope with such cases.

My honourable friend must have learned that we shall not be considering the Bills referred to the Committee before we have considered the motion moved by Senator Leblanc to the effect that the general law should be clarified or that something should be done about it so that we may know whether the law must be changed or whether we have to pass Bills of exemption. I believe that this is a priority; we must first consider this motion, and if we do not want passage of the Bills providing exemptions to the marriage law to be overly delayed, it is absolutely necessary that the Minister of Justice should tell us as soon as possible what he plans to do.

Senator Frith: As far as the first part of the question is concerned, I can say that, tomorrow morning, there will be the caucus meetings. In the afternoon, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will meet at two o'clock and the Committee on Foreign Affairs at four o'clock.

As for the other matter raised by Senator Asselin, I wish first of all to assure him that, on this side, we agree completely that the problem must be solved other than by passing a private Bill for each petition and that a general change is needed.

I can also assure Senator Asselin and the honourable senators that we are dealing with this issue. I discussed it with Senator Olson after his return today and suggested that the problem should be raised with the Minister and the Department. I have also suggested a solution or a way to solve the problem raised by Senator Asselin and the other members of the Committee by saying that, before consideration of these Bills or any discussion on this matter is resumed, we should at least have the assurance that a proposal will be made to bring a general solution to the problem.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, perhaps we could ask Senator Nurgitz, the deputy chairman of the committee, to tell us if he has contacted the Minister of Justice. If so, when does he expect the minister to appear before the committee?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am aware that the clerk of the committee has passed on to the minister's office a request for the minister to appear before the committee. My preliminary understanding was that the minister was not available this week. It was hoped that the committee could meet with him on the 6th, which is today.

Hon. Eric Cook: Is he campaigning?

Senator Nurgitz: As his "campaign manager," I am not able to speak.

Senator Frith: There is trouble there for someone.

Senator Nurgitz: In any event, honourable senators, I will raise again with the clerk of the committee the question of the availability of the minister. I thought it was understood that it was the wish of the committee to convene next solely for the purpose of meeting with the minister. I do not believe that the committee wishes to do anything else at this point, and I think that that information has been communicated to the minister.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, to underline what I said previously, it may be that I have to take some of the blame if there is a delay in the appearance of the minister, because after attending the last committee meeting I did send him a letter telling him the views of the committee and proposing another solution. It may be that he is considering those questions before appearing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

CANADAIR LTD.—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, this morning I received a statement issued by the minister responsible for the Canada Development Investment Corporation. That statement, combined with Supplementary Estimates (C) tabled yesterday, gives me an opportunity to ask certain questions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It was tabled here today.

Senator Phillips: I must point out that the tabling procedure is becoming much more efficient, because I received the estimates before they were tabled here.

Last year, Supplementary Estimates (A) contained $240 million for Canadair and now Supplementary Estimates (C) contain $310 million, for a total of $550 million in the last fiscal year for Canadair. Supplementary Estimates (A) contained $60 million for de Havilland and now Supplementary Estimates (C) contain $240 million, for a total of $300 million in the last fiscal year for that company. A total of $850 million has been provided for the two corporations in the two supplementary estimates. That, honourable senators, equals $2.3 million per day, and that is a rather expensive method of bearing the mistakes of an incompetent minister.

On October 19, 1983, at page 6076 of the Senate Debates, the minister stated that Canadair would require an additional $400 million to serve to the end of 1984. As I have pointed out, the two supplementary estimates now bring us to $550 million for Canadair alone, and we still have 10 months to go. Can the minister tell us why his estimate was so badly off base?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I will examine Senator Phillips' allegations with care to see if there are facts in them. I very much resent his statement referring to me, I presume, as an incompetent minister. I believe that I have executed my responsibilities for Canadair and de Havilland with great competence.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are speaking for yourself.

Senator Austin: I will be appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts and its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with detailed reports on the financial affairs of Canadair and the commercial opportunities for success in the years ahead. I am quite optimistic with respect to Canadair and de Havilland; I believe that we have a level of technology second to none in the world and that we can be successful commercially from this point.

Senator Phillips referred to there being 10 months to go. Perhaps, if he read a little more carefully, he would see that the financing I am requesting is for the whole of the fiscal year 1984-85. I believe that the funds contained in the supplementary estimates with respect to Canadair will be sufficient to carry its business forward successfully for that year. However, further financing may be required for de Havilland to take advantage of commercial opportunities available to various of its products.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am pleased that the minister will look at my statement, but I hope he has some assistance because, judging from the evidence he has presented to this house, he does not know fact from fiction. The minister has referred to certain techniques that have been developed. I have heard this answer a number of times. I would point out that the financing in the supplementary estimates equals $121,048 per worker. That makes them almost as expensive as Donald Macdonald. Can the minister tell this house what special techniques have been developed by either firm that are not already present in the industry in other countries?

Senator Austin: Senator Phillips is an amazing wanderer when he is questioning. He plucks figures out of the air, $121,000 here and $2 million there. They are not accurate in any logical or factual way; they are merely flying around in some kind of vortex in his mind. Canadair and de Havilland have excellent capacities in aircraft technology as indicated by their executive jet STOL, and their capacity to equip aircraft for special tasks, the market for which seems to be expanding. I will be making an extensive statement in the other place before the end of this month.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What do you mean, "the other place"?

Senator Austin: I shall give Senator Phillips an opportunity to study those statements as soon as possible and I hope that his attention span will be equal to the presentation.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am surprised that the honourable minister thinks that I wander around in my questioning. Perhaps I do, but I can assure this chamber that I learned the technique from the way he gives replies. I asked the minister for specific techniques and he avoided answering the question. I shall now ask him: Has either firm developed a technique that has been patented?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, it is strange that Senator Phillips is so ill-informed about the subject matter for which he has tried to take responsibility for the opposition over the past several months. If he knows nothing about the technology of these two companies, I shall get him a statement on their technological advancements; I hope it will bring him somewhat closer to an understanding of what it is they do. Of course, they have patents. However, that answer may have nothing to do with or a great deal to do with the commercial success of the work they have done. In other words, patents and technology may or may not be synonymous. The most effective technology may give a firm a competitive advantage though it may not be patented or copyrighted. So, as usual, I try very hard to answer Senator Phillips in the most open and genuine way, although his question is not very coherent. Frankly, I find his editorial reminiscing very sad. He talks about competence and discharging responsibilities and then floats away. If he has anything to say about the competence with which I am directing these two companies, I should like to hear it in detail and not just in editorial opinions. Then I could meet the fluff he is throwing around.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): He talks like a Tory and cannot understand your suggestion.

Senator Phillips: Perhaps the minister should give more information to this chamber. I was surprised to hear him say that he was going to make a statement before the other house—

Senator Asselin: Before the other house?

Senator Phillips: —but he is not making one here. I point out to the minister that the fiasco he has created has now cost the taxpayers more than Petro-Canada and is rapidly becoming as expensive as the Petroleum Incentive Program. It is time for the minister to give us some accurate, concise information, get rid of his befuddled attitude and come clean with Canadian taxpayers. They cannot afford any more of his answers.

Senator Austin: I shall try once again to assist Senator Phillips. I am an optimist, which is the way of a Liberal in Canadian society. Senator Phillips is pessimistic and cynical, which brings him to certain conclusions in his thinking process.

Senator Asselin: How is one an optimist with such deficits?

Senator Austin: I will be reporting before the appropriate committees of the other place which will deal with the estimates tabled. If the Senate wishes to have me report before it, there are means, such as introducing a motion, but at the moment there are standing terms of reference in the other place to bring ministers to account in detail for the discharge of their responsibilities. For that reason I shall be making detailed statements in the other place, and, as I said before, those statements will be available to honourable senators. I know that Senator Phillips will study with great care what it is I shall say in the other place. I hope that he can follow it. I resent deeply his editorial suggestion that somehow I have created a, to use his term, "fiasco" with respect to Canadair and de Havilland. There is no basis for that statement and it is untrue and unfair. I want him to understand clearly that I will not accept such a statement from him.

Hon. Robert Muir: Touchy, touchy!

Senator Asselin: Why don't you answer the question?

Senator Phillips: How would the minister describe the fiasco he has created? Would he call it a success? While he is avoiding giving information to the house, I would remind the minister of my motion with respect to this matter. When the minister discussed the subject he did not give any information. Will he bring in a statement that explains the whole fiasco?

Senator Austin: All the information on these two companies that I can give out will be made available at the end of this month in a carefully analyzed and clearly described way before committees of the other place. I will be happy to bring it before a committee of this house, if it wishes to have me give evidence. At the moment Senator Phillips is attempting to carry on a university type debating game over the facts. I have attempted to assist him. I will not answer general questions which will be answered more specifically in a few days. If he has a specific question to ask me I shall do my best; if he wishes to know what patents Canadair has issued, I shall ask Canadair to give me a list of those patents. I hope that will be of some assistance to Senator Phillips.

● (1520)

If the honourable senator has other specific questions, I shall do my best to assist him in his inquiries. However, I wish to make very clear to the honourable senator that I will not submit myself to little political games and political rhetoric within the confines of this subject.

Hon. Robert Muir: Too much politics in democracy!

Senator Austin: I shall answer his questions on facts; however, I shall also reply to his nonsense.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Phillips: The honourable minister seems to think that democracy is political. I am rather surprised that a cabinet minister would take that attitude. He has assured me that he will do his best to answer questions. I hope he improves.

[Senator Austin.]

Senator Austin: In reply to Senator Phillips, I think democracy is political. I am glad that it is.

Senator Muir: Now you admit it.

Senator Austin: I am glad we live in a society where we can stand in this chamber and exchange our political views. I am making it very clear that, if the honourable senator sends a political view to me with which I disagree, then he will receive a political view back. He will earn the same quality of reply as he seeks. If he seeks a higher quality of reply, then he must ask a question of higher quality.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—VACANCIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question I wish to pose about the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Since last year I have posed this same question on seven different occasions, definitely endeavouring to find out why no appointments have been made to fill the vacancies on the board of directors. I am sure that a man such as Senator Sinclair would agree with me in what I am now putting forward, that to run a successful corporation, whether it be a private enterprise or a crown corporation, there should be a board of directors.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: It is like the government, it has no board of directors.

Senator Muir: I would hesitate to say that to Senator Austin, he might get provoked. He is so thin skinned that he may become upset, have headaches and start to cry. You never know what will happen with him.

I have posed my question to the deputy leader on several occasions and also to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since the Leader of the Government is happily recovering from heart surgery I would not have the heart to pose it to him today if he were here—he has just removed himself from the chamber. I am glad he is back.

If it would not distress Senator Austin too much, since he is the Minister of State for Social Development, I will pose my question to him. Social development should be part of the responsibilities of the minister with respect to the Cape Breton Development Corporation since it deals with jobs, people's lives, their welfare and their income. To give the minister a little more information, the term of the final board member on the board of directors expired February 29. There are now no members on the board of directors of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I do not know who makes policy now, Dr. Larkin Kerwin having retired from the board months ago. He was certainly a brilliant man. However, the fact remains there is no one on the board at present. It is important that there should be a board of directors—I am sure I do not have to tell the Minister of State for Social Development that.

Could the minister take upon himself the task of finding out from the powers that be within the government what seems to be the problem with replacing board members who have left? Who makes policy? How does management carry out policy which is made by a non-existent board of directors? I do not say that it is the fault of the federal government completely; the provincial government is supposed to appoint two directors. Their last appointee left February 29. Tom Kent left over a year ago, and was not replaced.

At various times I have asked other ministers and the deputy leader to find out whether there is any consultation going on between the federal government and Premier Buchanan's government with respect to appointing members to the board. I have inquired into the delay in the appointing of members to the board, which is the responsibility of both the federal government and the provincial government, in order to guarantee a future for the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Thousands of lives depend on this corporation, as does the future development of Cape Breton Island.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I will seek the answers to Senator Muir's question from the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation and endeavour to reply at the earliest time. I am not personally briefed on the subject matter which the honourable senator raises as it does not fall within my immediate area of responsibility.

While I am on my feet I want to say that I did not feel any particular urge to cry while the honourable senator was asking his question.

Senator Muir: No, but when Senator Phillips was going to work on you.

Senator Austin: However, I am very sensitive to the concerns of the people whose lives have benefited from the work of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. If, perhaps, feeling sensitive and concerned is being "thin skinned" then I should possess that title.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—AMENDMENT PROCLAMATION— PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to a question asked at an earlier date by Senator Tremblay. I wonder if I could have leave of the Senate to do so since I must absent myself in the next few minutes in order to attend a cabinet meeting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Austin: Senator Tremblay asked a question on February 21 with respect to resolutions relating to aboriginal rights and the constitutional process. It was a most intriguing question. I have sought the answer which I think meets his inquiry.

The aboriginal constitutional resolution arising from the 1983 first ministers' accord on aboriginal rights has been adopted by the legislative assemblies of all provinces except Quebec. Quebec was not a signatory to the original accord and is not expected to introduce the resolution in the National Assembly. In accordance with the procedure for amending the Constitution set out in sections 38(1) and 39(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, the resolution may be proclaimed by the Governor General on or after May 31, 1984, the anniversary of adoption by the legislature of Nova Scotia, which was the first to do so.

Senator Tremblay asked me which provincial legislatures had adopted the resolution and on which dates. May I reply as follows:

Nova Scotia, May 31, 1983;

Alberta, June 3, 1983;

Prince Edward Island, June 16, 1983;

New Brunswick, June 28, 1983;

Manitoba, August 18, 1983;

Ontario, October 18, 1983;

British Columbia, October 21, 1983;

Saskatchewan, November 30, 1983;

Newfoundland, December 2, 1983.

The House of Commons and the Senate passed the resolution on June 29 and November 3, 1983, respectively. Accordingly, the requirements for the amendments set forth in section 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 have been met in that the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies of two-thirds of the provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population have adopted the resolution.

Section 39(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 further provides that unless all the provincial legislative assemblies have adopted a resolution the Governor General may not issue an amending proclamation before one year from the date on which that resolution was first adopted.

Since the resolution was not introduced in the National Assembly of Quebec, the proclamation by the Governor General can only be made on or after May 31, 1984—that is, one year after the resolution was first adopted by the Nova Scotia Legislature.

This background is necessary in order to come to the specific answer to your most specific question of interpretation, Senator Tremblay. The Constitution Act, 1982, as originally passed and still in force, required that one constitutional conference was to be convened by the Prime Minister within one year after the act came into force—that is, one year after April 17, 1982. This provision is contained in section 37. Thus, the conference of March 15 and 16, 1983 fulfilled the only constitutional requirement extant for a constitutional conference of first ministers.

However, article (1) of the 1983 Constitution Accord on Aboriginal Rights, which was signed at that conference, provides for another constitutional conference of first ministers to be convened by the Prime Minister within one year after the completion of the 1983 conference—that is, no later than March 16, 1984—and, as we all know, such a conference has been scheduled to be held on March 8 and 9, 1984. This, however, is a political rather than a constitutional requirement and is to be fulfilled, as I said, by that forthcoming conference.

The proposed resolution, which was appended as a schedule to the Accord, provides for an amendment to section 37 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which would require, inter alia:

—in addition to the conference convened in March, 1983, at least two constitutional conferences . . . the first within three years after April 17, 1982, and the second within five years after that date.

Once the resolution has been proclaimed, these two conferences will bring to a total of three the number of constitutionally-required conferences on the Constitution.

I believe that is the full answer to the question you asked, Senator Tremblay. I may say that a most interesting constitutional discussion was enjoyed by me as a result of your question when I raised the matter with officials and, finally, with the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I thank Senator Austin for his very elaborate answer. Since he is expected to attend a Cabinet meeting in a few minutes, this is hardly the time to put a series of supplementary questions. Still, if he will allow me, I will read his answer and, at the next sitting of the Senate, I will try to clear up a few points which give me some concern. I will not do that today.

However, I do have a question about something he said earlier. He indicated that he will appear before a committee of the House of Commons in a few days to answer questions in certain fields for which he is responsible as member of the Cabinet. In view of that, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government concerning the application of our Rule 104. Under that Rule, a senator must have leave of the Senate to appear before a committee of the House of Commons. In this case, does Senator Austin need leave of the Senate to appear before a committee of the House of Commons which is considering problems in the field for which he is responsible as member of the Cabinet?

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that this question has come up on previous occasions. Senator Tremblay has raised rule 104, which provides as follows:

(1) When the House of Commons requests that a senator or any of the officers, clerks, or servants of the Senate attend before the House of Commons to be examined or appear before any committee thereof, such request shall be by Message from the House of Commons requesting that the Senate grant leave to such senator, officer, clerk or servant to attend.

(2) If the Senate grants leave, an officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall attend before the House of Commons or a committee thereof, and a senator may attend if he thinks fit.

[Senator Austin.]

(3) Without such leave, a senator, officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall not, on any account, under penalty of being committed to the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod or to prison during the pleasure of the Senate, go down to the House of Commons, or send his answer in writing, or appear by counsel to answer any accusation there.

(4) In the absence of a Message referred to in subsection (1), a senator who so desires may voluntarily appear before any committee of the House of Commons.

I do not know whether an official request by message has come from the other place. However, if it does come in the form contemplated by subsection (1) as a request for Senator Austin to appear, and the conditions referred to in rule 104 are engaged, then they will apply.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Rule 104(4) of the Senate states:

(4) In the absence of the Message referred to . . .

Hon. Martial Asselin: The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that no point of order has been raised to ask you to make a ruling. It was simply an exchange between the Leaders of the two political parties in the Senate. If you want to enlighten us immediately, I am prepared to listen to you.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is why I am here, Senator Asselin.

Rule 104(4) of the Senate states:

In the absence of a Message referred to in subsection (1), a senator who so desires may voluntarily appear before any committee of the House of Commons.

I think that that settles the matter. I only wanted to help you.

Senator Asselin: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but that does not settle the matter.

When we were ministers on this side of the House, the question had been raised and debated.

The ruling of the then Speaker, Senator Grosart, was that during this session the Senate would give a general authorization to ministers of the Crown to agree to appear before committees of the other place.

In my opinion, the Senate should act as it did then. This House should give a general authorization to ministers of the Crown to appear before the committees of the House of Commons, without specifically being granted leave by the Senate every time they want to do so.

I think that we in the Official Opposition are prepared to endorse that precedent created when we were ministers of the Crown.

On behalf of the Opposition, I am prepared to agree that, when ministers of the Crown are called upon to appear before a committee of the other place, leave be granted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I understand correctly the intent of our Rule 104—it is clear, it has already been revised—it is stated in subsection (4):

In the absence of a Message referred to . . .

If one reads the whole Rule, it is clear that a senator cannot be required to appear before the House of Commons or one of its committees without leave of the Senate.

The important point is the fact that:

In the absence of a Message referred to in subsection (1), a senator who so desires may . . .

The idea behind subsection (1) is to obtain leave for a senator to say: The other place has asked or ordered me to appear, but I prefer not to do so.

Otherwise, subsection (4) of Rule 104 would be meaningless. If I understand the situation correctly, as I said at the beginning, if the conditions set forth in subsection (1) are imperative, so is the result. In a case where it is a matter of voluntary appearance, as specified in subsection (4), then the conditions of subsection (1) do not apply.

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary question, or a comment, as the case may be.

I understand very well that, pursuant to Rule 104(4), a senator may, if he so wishes, attend, participate in or appear before a committee of the House of Commons. If the decision is his to make, it seems to me that, from the point of view of the Commons and when the senator is a member of the Cabinet, this procedure can be a practical and concrete solution to the problem, but it remains unsatisfactory. The House of Commons or its committee has the right to ask a minister to be accountable and answer questions.

I am wondering—I am raising this question in light of the comment made by Senator Asselin—it seems to me that the procedure adopted by the previous government did take two aspects into account, in the sense that it acknowledged the principle whereby a committee of the House of Commons has the right to ask a senator, who happens to be a minister, to be accountable and answer any question put to him. In such a situation, a message is called for and the Senate must acknowledge it and say that leave has been granted. There is a question of principle on both sides.

Those are the comments I wanted to make after the clarification of Mr. Speaker.

[English]

● (1540)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it seems to me to be a simple matter and we can obtain a ruling if one is requested.

Senator Asselin: Are you requesting a ruling from His Honour the Speaker?

Senator Frith: No, but if that is what is being requested—

Senator Asselin: I did not ask for a ruling.

Senator Frith: I know you did not. Senator Asselin did not raise the point; Senator Tremblay did. I am not clear whether or not Senator Tremblay requested a ruling, but in any event it seems clear that he did ask me to give a response to his question with respect to rule 104.

It is clear from the reading of that rule that if the House of Commons wants to demand the appearance of a minister—and it does not say a committee of the House of Commons, but the House of Commons—before the House or one of its committees, it must do so by message, and if it does so by message then rule 104 (1) applies. Then the procedures set out in rule 104 subparagraph (2) take effect, as does the penalty in subparagraph (3).

If the request does not come from the House of Commons in the form of a message, then the senator can appear voluntarily.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, as I understood Senator Tremblay's question, it did not include an issue, for the moment, but anticipated a possible problem. If there is a lacuna in the rules, then the rules committee ought to address that.

Certainly, as Senator Tremblay and Senator Asselin have stated, it would be anomalous if each legislative chamber could block the appearance of a minister in the other chamber. It would be anomalous if this chamber could block my appearance as a minister of the Crown before a House of Commons committee. I know that that is not the intention. If the words give rise to an ambiguity, I suggest that the rules committee be asked to consider the issue, and perhaps take appropriate action.

Senator Asselin: Following what has been said by the minister, I think we should ask His Honour the Speaker to refer to the precedent set during the previous session. In reading the decision given by that Speaker you should, Your Honour, render a judgment, if you so wish.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: The point raised by Senator Tremblay, as I perceived it, was that there should be some action taken by the Senate to ensure that a senator who is a minister will be forced to appear before a House of Commons committee, but I should draw your attention to rule 104(2), which states:

If the Senate grants leave, an officer, clerk or servant of the Senate shall attend before the House of Commons or a committee thereof, and a senator may attend if he thinks fit.

So, by passing the kind of resolution you suggest, it would still, in effect, not force a minister to appear before a House of Commons committee if he did not wish to do so.

Senator Asselin: The same point was raised in 1979.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. The Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the testing of Cruise missiles. I believe that my honourable friend was asked this question two weeks ago and that he took it as notice.

Why has the Government not waited for the Supreme Court ruling before authorizing the testing of Cruise missiles over Canada which took place today? I do not want to discuss the substance or the significance of the testing of the Cruise missiles over Canada. What I find very strange is that the executive did not wait for the highest court in the land to make a ruling before authorizing the Americans to proceed with those tests.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I understood what was said in the news this morning—

Senator Asselin: I am not referring to the Federal Court, but to the Supreme Court.

Senator Frith: This morning, the Government was waiting for the results. The preparations were underway, but the testing had not begun before the ruling of the Federal Court was made.

If anything has changed since this morning, I will try and get more information.

As I understood the news from Western Canada, a plane has left Alaska, I believe, and we were waiting for the court ruling.

If the situation has changed, I can try to inquire about it.

Senator Asselin: I think that my colleague has misunderstood my question or perhaps I did not express myself clearly.

I am not speaking about the ruling made by the Federal Court this morning which has rejected the injunction sought by the lawyers representing the peace group that wanted to stop the tests taking place this morning. I am not speaking about this ruling. The Federal Court has made a ruling which rejected the injunction.

According to the mid-day news, the Americans had proceeded with the Cruise missile tests after being advised of the Federal Court ruling.

As the executive and the judiciary are separate bodies in this country and as it was the executive which decided that the American missiles would be tested over our territory, this whole problem was submitted to Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling on whether the decision of the executive could be challenged. The point at issue is whether this decision of authorizing the testing of missiles over Canada should have been made by the Canadian Parliament rather than by the executive alone.

This is an important question which has been asked for some time and on which the Supreme Court has reserved its ruling. Of course, the Supreme Court has not had time to give a ruling yet.

In view of this, why did the Canadian Government not ask the Americans to postpone the testing of their Cruise missiles until a ruling had been made, not by the Federal Court which handed down its ruling this morning, but by the Supreme Court? This is the legal problem which I face.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the problem exists because the executive and the legal powers are separate entities in our system. The question is as follows: Should the executive wait for the decisions of the legal authorities and refrain from doing what it should do until the courts have ruled? Today, we are faced with a political decision. This decision seems to have offended Senator Asselin. If it is simply a political decision, I cannot give you more information because I would simply be responding to what has occurred. I can certainly ask the authorities whether certain aspects have not yet been explained so that the other senators may form their own opinion on this matter.

Senator Asselin: This matter should be considered by the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a short statement on the current situation in Lebanon, as of 8.30 a.m. today.

As expected, the Lebanese cabinet, chaired by President Gemayel, yesterday formally declared the May 17, 1983 troop withdrawal agreement with Israel null and void. The cabinet announcement also indicated that the government would ensure the security of southern Lebanon and prevent infiltration of PLO guerrillas across Israel's northern border, thereby hoping to preserve its substantive commitment to Israel and, thereby, facilitate the withdrawal of Israeli forces. The statement failed to mention the status of Syrian troops. Press reports indicate Israel has rejected Lebanese overtures to reopen discussions on security arrangements in the south. The treaty had been a major obstacle to resumption of the national reconciliation conference. Informed sources indicate that the conference will resume on March 12 in Lausanne.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

SUCO—FINANCING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): In connection with the question raised by Senator Asselin on February 21 last concerning SUCO's financing, it should be noted first of all that SUCO and CUSO have been two separate legal entities since April 1981. CUSO will have sent 535 volunteers to Third World countries in 1983-84 and CIDA's contributions to this volunteer program will reach $13.5 million. Under the 1983-84 agreement, CIDA was to contribute $5.8 million to help SUCO supply 210 person-years to Third World countries, that is, some 300 volunteers.

The decision to discontinue SUCO's funding was made by Minister Lapointe in July 1983 and constitutes an isolated case. This decision was based on the following reasons:

First, SUCO's deficit had increased over the previous three years. By the end of the fiscal year 1981, 1982 and 1983, it stood at $270,000, $351,000 and $621,000 respectively.

Second, under the 1981-82 agreement between CIDA and SUCO, the latter was supposed to send 95 new volunteers. As a matter of fact, SUCO had recruited 60 new volunteers while it had a staff of 50 in Canada. Although the 1982-83 agreement called for the recruiting of 145 new volunteers, only 106 were actually recruited that year.

Third, SUCO's accounting procedures were not adequate. CIDA asked SUCO for the first time in May 1981 to improve these procedures and assumed the costs for the consultants hired to set up an improved system.

Finally, in 1982, two boards of directors resigned, the first one during the Summer of 1982, and the second one, together with nine employees, during the Summer of 1983. The conclusion the administrators themselves arrived at was that it was impossible to administer SUCO.

On September 29, 1983, SUCO's volunteers were advised of this decision, as well as the reasons behind it, in a letter from Minister Pepin.

SUCO's representatives met Minister Pepin on November 1, 1983, to advise him of their decisions. Following a careful review of SUCO's proposals, the Minister decided to maintain the decision.

CIDA is taking all necessary steps to ensure that arrangements are made for all SUCO volunteers to stay on after April 1, 1984. Five Canadian organizations with volunteer programs overseas are helping CIDA during this transition period.

CIDA is proud of the development work carried out by non-governmental organizations. The decision concerning SUCO's funding must not be interpreted as CIDA's new policy toward non-governmental organizations, but rather as an incentive to a better management of taxpayers' money.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Without unduly delaying our proceedings, I insist that we should reconsider the matter. If the reply is not satisfactory to me, I do not want the debate to be closed.

Senator Frith: I entirely agree that we could go on with this discussion next Thursday.

Senator Asselin: The main point is that in my opinion the president of CIDA or her representative should appear before a committee of the Senate to explain this situation. The two pages of this letter cannot settle the matter. According to the representations made by individuals from a non-governmental group, I am under the impression that the matter cannot be solved in those two pages.

Senator Frith: We could consider the matter next Thursday. The letter is a report made by the general director of the Institutional Cooperation and Development Services Division. We could consider on Thursday all supplementary questions arising from this letter. As for asking the minister to appear before a Senate committee, it is for the committee to decide. However, it is agreed that we could discuss this matter more thoroughly on Thursday.

THE BUDGET

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on February 21, 1984, concerning possible changes in the levy for the Canada Pension Plan. May I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, while contribution rates must eventually rise, this was recognized at the inception of the CPP. The current contribution rates and the accumulated fund are large enough to pay expected benefits until the turn of the century.

Earlier increases may be desirable, even if not required to pay current benefits, to ensure an orderly rise in the rates to the 8 to 10 per cent range now envisaged. The federal government intends to consult with the provinces to determine an appropriate schedule of contribution rates, paying attention to the proposal to institute pay-as-you-go financing.

INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on February 21, 1984, Senator Roblin asked a question concerning government interest rate projections. As some honourable senators may remember, while it has been the policy of the government to release its forecasts of the interest charges on the national debt, it has not been the policy to release the interest rate projections used in making these forecasts.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That answer can be taken as read.

Senator Frith: The rationale for refusing to do so is set out. May I, then, have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Since financial markets are affected by a wide array of diverse factors, including expectations of future interest rates and the uncertainty associated with future economic conditions generally, the government believes that it would be unwise to indicate to the market what it anticipates interest rates will be. Furthermore, while broad trends in interest rate developments can be identified with some degree of confidence, it is extremely difficult to identify the future path of interest rates over short periods of time. Consequently, although assumptions concerning future interest rates must be made for planning purposes, it is not the policy of the government to reveal these assumptions.

MORTGAGE RATE PROTECTION PLAN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on February 21, 1984, Senator Roblin asked whether the government expected the mortgage rate protection plan to be self-supporting, in other words, paid for by the 1.5 per cent that the mortgagees will contribute. May I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The government expects the mortgage rate protection plan to be self-supporting under normal circumstances. As the budget documents indicate, moderate sustained declines in interest rates are expected over the 1984-88 period. Under these circumstances or under conditions of relative stability in interest rates, the MRPP would be self-supporting.

With extraordinary interest rate increases and fluctuations, there would be an element of subsidy. A number of such interest rate scenarios have been considered in choosing the parameters of the program—the premium, deductibility, the 75 per cent coverage ratio, et cetera. Under reasonable assumptions with respect to the take-up of the plan and other variables, average annual net expenditures under these interest rate scenarios could range up to $200 million over a 10-year period. The scenarios considered included the interest rate pattern actually experienced over the period 1974 to 1983

PROVINCIAL REVENUE—IMPACT OF BUDGET MEASURES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin asked a question on February 21, 1984, relating to provincial revenue impact on budget measures that will be useful for the budget debate, which I hope to start under an inquiry either today or Thursday. May I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In the preamble to the Honourable Duff Roblin's question a number of budget tax changes are discussed as having, it seems for 1984, revenue implication for provinces party to the tax collection agreements. A number of inaccuracies are mentioned which I would like to rectify before providing the provincial impact of the budget measures.

Some of the measures mentioned such as the elimination of the $100 standard deduction are not part of the February 15, 1984 budget but were announced in the April 19, 1983 budget. Other measures, such as the modification of the $200 federal tax reduction do not generate an impact on provincial revenues. It has an impact on federal tax revenues only. Also, for other measures, such as the changes to Registered Retirement Savings Plans, the changes will not be effective until the 1985 taxation year.

The following table provides the impact on provincial revenues for 1984, 1985 and 1986 from the tax changes to the personal and corporate tax structure presented in the April 19, 1983 and February 15, 1984 budget for the provinces party to the tax collection agreements. These include all provinces except Quebec at the personal income tax level and all provinces excluding Quebec, Ontario and Alberta at the corporate level.

Impact on Provincial Revenues from Budget

Tax Changes	Taxation Year
	1984	1985	1986
April 19, 1983 budget	-85	-150	-160
February 15, 1984 budget	-25	-95	-130
Total Impact	-110	-245	-290

It is important to note that the impact of these tax changes on provincial revenues will be partially offset by an increase in transfers to provinces under the Established Programs Financing Arrangements. The approximate increase in respect of the three taxation years 1984, 1985 and 1986 is $52 million, $94 million and $113 million respectively.

In addition, many of these measures were designed to help stimulate the economic recovery which translate into larger tax base for all levels of government. With the projected economic growth, provincial tax revenues are expected to grow rapidly and should compensate for the revenue loss from the budget tax changes.

LEBANON—PROPOSED MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on February 21, 1984, concerning the possibility of Canadian participation in a proposed United Nations peacekeeping force in Lebanon. May I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, Canada has not been approached with regard to an eventual participation in a United Nations peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

If we were approached on this subject, while keeping in mind difficult local conditions, Canada would be disposed to examine its possible participation in such a force if it were to make an effective contribution to stabilization and national reconciliation in Lebanon although such objectives are dependent upon the Lebanese people themselves as well as other parties concerned.

A certain number of conditions, of which the following are the most important, would however have to be met:

(a) such a force would have to be under the auspices of the United Nations, be neutral and impartial and would have to have a clear and adequate mandate to allow it to fulfil the functions assigned to it;

(b) the deployment of such a force and its participants would have to be accepted by all the concerned parties;

(c) the concerned parties would have to agree to maintain a ceasefire and there should be reasonable and serious hope of a reconciliation between different factions after the deployment of such a force

(d) the financing of such a force should be assured by all of the countries belonging to the UN rather than through voluntary contributions.

Such a force would appear to be hypothetical at this stage, as we wait for a clarification of other positions of the parties involved and the present situation on site in Lebanon as well as waiting for agreement amongst the various countries who are members of the Security Council on the principle of establishing such a United Nations peacekeeping force.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

PROPOSED TASK FORCE ON YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to two questions asked by Senator Marshall on February 2, 1984, concerning youth unemployment. The first question he asked was whether the federal government was considering establishing a task force to examine the youth unemployment problem. May I have permission for the answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, there are no plans at present to establish a task force to examine youth unemployment. The government has appointed a Minister of State for Youth who has responsibility for reviewing this issue as well as others affecting youth.

It is the intention of the Minister of State for Youth to undertake, in the near future, to meet with youth, youth organizations and our economic partners in order to gain a better appreciation of current youth issues and to encourage the active participation of the private sector in the search for meaningful resolutions to the labour market difficulties facing young Canadians.

The Chamber of Commerce has decided to go ahead on its own with a task force to study youth unemployment. Although the federal government will not participate directly, the Minister of State for Youth and the Minister of Employment and Immigration have encouraged the Chamber of Commerce to conduct its independent review and have offered support in the way of statistical data and background information from Employment and Immigration.

Senator Frith: The second question was whether the federal government was aware of the youth training scheme which is a United Kingdom program. The answer to that question is "yes."

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

RECONSTRUCTION OF SENATE SPEAKER'S ENTRANCE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Donahoe on February 21, 1984, concerning work being done on the Speaker's entrance to the Senate. May I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Since the Centre Block was completed in the early 1920s there have been problems with the two Speakers' entrances because of ice and snow falling from the upper roofs. Sometime prior to 1967 a wooden enclosure had been erected around the Senate Speaker's entrance and steps. It would appear that this was removed prior to the Royal Visit in 1967.

In the early 1960s architectural drawings were prepared for Public Works which appear to have resulted from requests from the Speakers. These proposals were not proceeded with at that time. As an interim measure, flat roofs supported on pipe columns were installed at both entrances to reduce the winter hazards.

In the early 1970s new proposals of a less extensive nature were prepared by Public Works but were again deferred. In the late 1970s the Speakers again requested that something be done to improve the conditions at these entrances. After study it was recommended that the 1962 proposals be included in the major Centre Block renovations program being developed by Public Works at that time.

Because of delays in the implementation of this program, a formal request was made to Public Works by Black Rod in December 1982 on behalf of the Speaker of the Senate to expedite some action to provide a winter enclosure for the Speaker's entrance. Drawings of the 1962 proposals were updated and submitted to the Speakers for approval in 1983/1984 for the work.

In response to the questions raised by Senator Donahoe, the answers are as follows:

1. The drawings for the two entrances were submitted through the Clerk of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms to the Speakers sometime in July 1983 and were approved by them shortly after the resumption of sittings in September.

2. Action on these entrances has been requested at various times by the incumbent Speakers since shortly after the building was completed, and including the specific request from Colonel T. G. Bowie dated December 13, 1982.

3. The cost of each of the new entrances will be about $140,000.00

The new entrances will be constructed in stone to match the existing building and include porches at the roadway similar to the House and Senate entrances on the south side of the building. They will provide adequate and permanent protection for the Speakers and other official visitors including the Governor General and other officials and heads of state who normally enter the building through these doorways.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

SPECIAL EMPLOYMENT INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Phillips on February 7, 1984, concerning whether senators have been asked to submit any projects under the Special Employment Initiatives Program.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has indicated that he is prepared to consider for funding under the special employment initiative any project submitted to him. Senators wishing to submit projects should therefore send details of the projects to the minister at the House of Commons.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Côtteau).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Côtteau, in whose name this order stands, has indicated that he is willing to yield to anyone wishing to speak to this order, but I remind honourable senators that that debate, when it resumes, will be on the eighth and last day of the debate on the Speech from the Throne.

Order stands.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I must assure my colleagues that the seeming diffidence, reluctance, hesitation and "on again-off again" that has been displayed by me since I adjourned this debate is not deliberate, because when I moved the motion for adjournment I did not know that there was going to be a leadership convention. I had not heard the people who were saying: "Oh, no, not me. I will need a couple of weeks to think it over." It was just a coincidence of the timing of the Senate debates. If I had not been told long ago that you should never begin a speech by an apology, that it will come naturally to those who hear you and you do not have to say it, I might apologize for the seeming delays and I might even say that I am sorry that it is, shall we say, in senatorial terms, probably late in the day, but I am not terribly apologetic about that because I know that everybody has had a week off for the winter break. As well, we are meeting only twice this week, so I am not terribly apologetic for the ordeal you must endure if you stay and listen to my remarks on this important subject of Senate reform.

I am somewhat ill at ease on one account. I was trained in the university scheme of debating in which you heard someone for the pro and someone for the con—affirmative and negative—and here I find myself moving into a fast-flowing stream heading in what I think is the right direction and everybody I hear is saying the kinds of things with which I agree. Being a minority type of man, a Progressive Conservative and a Red Tory at that, I am not used to being in a majority; it upsets me. I just wonder how I got there and who is wrong. I am following Senators Le Moine, Steuart and Donahoe. Where are the people who think that this report is a good thing? Why are they not standing up and convincing me? I might have given a different speech had I heard the eloquence of some of the principal architects of this fine report, but I have been denied that opportunity.

It is a sad situation. Our senatorial colleagues and those from the other place clearly have done a fine job. I agree with Senator Donahoe that it is a well-printed, well-written and interesting report. It is the kind of thing of which the Senate can be proud, and I congratulate all my colleagues for their diligence. I would love to be able to say, "Not only did you do a good job, but you thought well and you came up with good conclusions," but, if I said that, I would be either a jokester or a hypocrite, and I am too old to take up those two characteristics and qualities now. I am afraid, honourable senators, that this beautifully-written, well-bound, attractive report will have no better success in terms of enactment than the less voluptuous earlier volumes which have preceded it.

Paddy Sherman of the Ottawa Citizen said that the committee began by studying all the former reports and for that alone, they deserved a medal. That is an interesting remark for a newsman to make; here we are much too sedate to talk like that.

I do not see an enthusiastic majority in this chamber. I read that, at best, perhaps one-third of the senators might be supportive. With his usual sardonic understatement, my colleague Senator Doody summed up the Senate's reaction to the committee's recommendation of an elected Senate. It is lovely to quote senators' remarks from newspapers. He said:

I could hardly say there's universal joy over the idea. The older senators warned us that they'd heard all this reform talk before and it would lead nowhere. Now I think they're going to be able to say, 'I told you so.'

I am not going to say, "I told you so"; that I will avoid, but I did say it.

There is not much from the other place about this. I read the House of Commons Hansard and I do not see much enthusiasm. I have not heard of any of the leadership contenders becoming excited about it. That does not surprise me, because I never thought that, when the members of the House of Commons really put their minds to it, they wanted another elected house on this hill. Wouldn't that house compete for power, for prestige and for the press? We do not have that worry; we are not going to get too much press attention. I am afraid, honourable senators, that with the impending big event in the Liberal Party we are going to get even less. We are going to lose our high profile with the media. The only way the Senate is going to get a look-in on press coverage—and I want Senator Frith to listen to this very carefully—is for some senator to run for the leadership. That is why I mention Senator Frith.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I don't want to be in that much trouble.

Senator Macquarrie: I do not like to see our chamber ignored. Eugene Forsey, a man who never pulls punches, said simply that the House of Commons is afraid of being upstaged by newly-elected senators who would speak for their regions.

Another group is very important in terms of constitutional change—the premiers. We need the consent of seven provinces, representing the majority of the Canadian population, for any great change in our parliamentary system to be effected. An amendment prerequisite to restructure our national legislature requires their consent.

I have heard the premiers talk of Senate reform. Some of them have authored books about it—very nice volumes, too. Where are the premiers now? Are they in the forefront and advocating reforms to which, at an earlier day, at earlier stages, at earlier dominion-provincial conferences, they attached importance?

In the lists of witnesses who appeared before the committee, I see the names of two premiers from the provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and of a representative of the Northwest Territories. Where were the giants of Confederation? We thought they were interested. I believe they were hospitable to the committee when it visited their capitals but, to use the jargon of the day, they do not seem to be "up front" on this at all. In fact, to use my sort of reference—archaic, square, Bible-quoter—it seemed to me that, when they talked with members of the committee, they came like Nicodemus—by night, quietly, off the record—we do not have a Hansard report. Now we discover that eight out of ten demurred from appearing before the committee day or night. Not too much support there.

The committee, in its report, I thought, showed great solicitude for the provinces. A charming section of the report states:

Provincial governments, which now frequently speak on behalf of the people of their provinces in federal as well as provincial matters,—

That is rather a good one.

—would no longer have to carry that additional load.

I am afraid, honourable senators, that those sentiments of solicitude, of care, of sharing the burden, will be unrequited. The silence from the provincial thrones is very significant and very ominous for those who want this report to be adopted.

It seems to me that the provinces have other priorities. I believe they would prefer to do their own representing directly. I am told that about 500 federal-provincial conferences are held each year. If a change were to take place, I think they would like to appoint the members of the upper house because, when appointments are made by provincial authorities, it is not patronage; it is only when a federal appointment is made that it is mean, dirty, political patronage. I think they would rather carry on as they are and have been, whether the upper house of Parliament is elected or not. That, honourable senators, is another grim forecast I feel compelled to make.

Premier Peckford of Newfoundland, an outspoken man, as many Newfoundlanders are, said simply that it is not a top priority. The Premier of Manitoba has a different view. He thinks we should abolish the place.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about the Premier of Prince Edward Island?

Senator Macquarrie: The Premier of Manitoba is an abolitionist on capital punishment and on the Senate—consistency at least.

I am going to get to the Premier of Prince Edward Island, Senator Asselin; I believe in leaving the best to the last. The Premier of Quebec was colourfully condemnatory. He said, if I remember rightly, that it would mean adding another section to the madhouse down here. The spokesman for the Premier of Ontario, Attorney-General McMurtry—perhaps this indicates why the Conservative Party of Ontario is so long successful; they know what to say and what not to say—said that the opinion within the ranks of the Government of Ontario would be quite divided on the issue. He did not get into any trouble with that comment.

Senator Stanbury, who is an expert and has served on many of these committees, put the thing in the most succinct terms. He said:

Premiers now believe they have a role far beyond their jurisdiction, they see themselves as spokesmen (for their provinces) on every national issue.

Senator Perrault, whom I did not hear from today, said:

Provincial premiers see themselves as the only legitimate representatives of provincial and regional issues. They'll view an elected Senate as a rival.

So warned Senator Ray Perrault during the hearings. He was right, according to the Toronto Star. Honourable senators, I do not usually quote the newspapers in this place, but I am so excited about quoting senators that I just get carried away.

● (1610)

The committee must ask: Where are the friends of yesterday? The premiers do not seem to be avid; the Senate is not enthusiastic; the House of Commons gives no ringing endorsements. But what of the government that set the whole thing in motion and that, at one time, said: "Do this in 12 months and 12 months only; no waiting, no dilly-dallying, no gathering dust"? I detect a lack of zeal there, too.

I read in the Toronto Star—it is my day for the Toronto Star—that Prime Minister Trudeau has warned that he favours Senate reform but has warned as well that the requirement for provincial consent could make the process a tough and lengthy one. Honourable senators, that is why we love the federal system. On questions like this we can always say, "Oh, after you, Alphonse." "No, after you, Gaston"—the provinces—the federal—the provinces. You never get through the door that way, and that is what the whole story is about. Perhaps we should have seen that the apparent zeal really covered up a tepidity in the matter. As I recall, the motion to establish this committee languished on the order paper for about four months before the personnel of the committee were actually named and the committee was therefore empowered to do its work. There was a change somewhere along the line—something that perhaps we did not notice. The tone, the tempo of the earlier message had changed, and the committee, which had once been told to "get ye out into the land and bring me a new Senate," was replaced by something much less purposeful, much less direct than what had been foreseen in these strong winds of change.

Honourable senators, I read—perhaps for the last time—from the Toronto Star:

Officials in the Prime Minister's Office and Government House Leader Yvon Pinard's office yesterday called Senate reform a medium-term priority unlikely to receive any aggressive government support this year.

God help us, it is only March. That is an awfully long time to do without "aggressive support".

Honourable senators, I was out of the country, shall we say, in January, and I received a call from the CBC in Charlotte-town—they are smart enough not to forget me—asking what I thought were the prospects for the adoption of this committee report. I said that it is about as likely to occur as I am to become the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Senator Frith: Oh, are the chances that good?

Senator Macquarrie: When I returned to Ottawa that night, I read that Eugene Forsey had said the same thing. So here are two non-conformists, both after that particular job but having the same view on the support of this report.

Honourable senators, one thing that has impressed me about Senate reform is that, down through the years, few subjects in Canadian politics have had a more popular initiation. The Liberal Party is having a convention here in June. It held another one in 1893 in this same city, where the big item on the agenda was Senate reform. 1893 is an awfully long time ago, honourable senators, but while it is always popular to suggest Senate reform, there is absolutely no political danger in doing nothing about it. I think that is where we are at the present time. It seems to be a lovely idea but it is never executed. This reminds me of Butler's Erewhon and the musical banks—they were just great and the currency was beautiful but nobody used them.

The Liberals did not suffer after 1893 for not having reformed the Senate, and they have been in for an awfully long time—some people think for too long, especially the poor Conservatives. I have a feeling that we are not going to see tremendous urgency on this matter. I do not know if anyone is going to line up all the hopefuls—the 15 people who want to be leader of the Liberal Party—and grade them on a scale of one to ten as to what they are going to do about Senate reform.

Honourable senators, so much for my role as the prophet. Now I will try that of the analyst. There are some other things which trouble me. I had hoped that, some senators having been to Australia, the committee would have followed more carefully the Australian model. That is what I expected would happen. I thought that we would see recommended something more exciting and interesting, like equality of provincial representation. Ah, there would be something!

Hon. John M. Godfrey: For Prince Edward Island!

Senator Macquarrie: We are not going to forget Prince Edward Island, no, indeed, but I thought that the Prince Edward Island government produced a very interesting document. That government did not fall into another error that the committee fell into, I am afraid, in suggesting, as it did, a bigger Senate. I think it is a great mistake to suggest, if we see something that is inadequate, that we should just make it bigger. The same mistake is being made, if I may say so, in the House of Commons. The Americans have put a restriction on the number of members in the House of Representatives, no matter what happens to the population. "It is not growing like a tree in bulk, doth make man better be." Size is not the answer at all. The Government of Prince Edward Island suggested a smaller Senate, and I think that that is a wise suggestion.

Honourable senators, the American Senate is the most powerful deliberative body in the world. Probably not since the great Roman Senate, in its brief heyday, has there been such a body. It handles the affairs of that vast nation, and there are only one hundred senators. In Australia—that beloved country of reformers—the Senate numbers sixty. Why have we suggested a Senate numbering nearly two hundred? I could not understand it then and I do not understand it now.

Honourable senators, go back and think of Australia. That would be my suggestion.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Another trip.

Senator Macquarrie: Senator Marshall says, "Another trip," but I suppose that, to be really fair, we could stay here and count them, if we wanted to.

What has upset me—and I thank Senator Godfrey for directing me to this—is that there has been a half-hearted move towards equality, but, in this year of George Orwell, it seems that some are equal but not quite as equal as the rest. There are so many representing Nova Scotia, the same number representing New Brunswick, the same number representing Newfoundland—great—the same number for Manitoba—fine—but what about Prince Edward Island? There are 12 for Nova Scotia and six for P.E.I. Is that equality or is it discrimination? What the committee has done is compound an error that was made between 1865 and 1867. Two provinces came in to join with the "province" of Canada from the east, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and how did they divide up the Senate? They gave the one province 48 and the two provinces from the east settled for 24. It should have been the other way round. It shows that even our great ancestors—and a lot of them were Conservatives—made a mistake. People will say, "Well, of course, Prince Edward Island does not have as many people." The point is that representation by population prevails in the lower house not in the upper house. Prince Edward Island deserves the same as the rest, not because it has 122,000 people, but because it is one of ten provinces. That is the explanation and that is what the Americans saw and the Australians saw. I think the committee saw it, but it was through a glass darkly and they did not quite get that far. Had they done so, they would have struck a blow for democracy. They would have come ringing down in support of a true confederation; and I could have swallowed and accepted practically everything else, had they made new ground like great reformers should. We must not lose sight of these things. Perhaps in some future dispensation this will be looked at again, because I think there will be more reviews of the Senate.

● (1620)

I do not like the discrimination against Prince Edward Island and I wonder where it came from. I wonder if someone picked up some old note, as there is an awful lot of paper lying around Ottawa. For years—and I am constrained from saying what I really think of it because this is a respectable assembly—they had a formula for paying lieutenant governors. The rule was that everybody got $10,000, except Ontario and Quebec, which got $12,000, and Prince Edward Island, which got $8,000. That foolish formula seems to be hanging around again. In terms of the Senate everybody gets 12, except the two big ones and Prince Edward Island, which gets six. Shame, shame! We got the matter straightened out about the lieutenant governors. It took a long time. I am sorry to say that a government of my own party did not do it, but Mr. Pearson's did. It was a fine gesture and shows a great perception of the true nature of federalism and equality, the juridical equality of the provinces. They are unequal in many respects, but you must not regard them as unequal in juridical matters.

I was delighted with the speeches that I heard. I was most moved by Senator Le Moynes. He was eloquent in both languages and, in my judgment, magnificently correct in his conclusions. How could you not respect a man like Senator Le Moynes?

Senator Asselin: He is a poet.

Senator Macquarrie: He is a poet and he is more than that. In my judgment, he is a hero. Any man who stands as a minority of one must have something that is all right about him. I thought of James Russell Lowell who said:

They are slaves who dare not be

In the right with two or three.

But he stood there one, alone, and he had a good word to say about the principle of appointments.

Senator Frith: And he agrees with you?

Senator Macquarrie: That is the real intellectual coup de grâce, of course. Or, since he spoke first, let me say that I agree with him. I thought that he was very sharp, as a good scholar, when he drew attention to that hurtful but clear, sharp line at the beginning:

An appointed Senate no longer meets the needs of the Canadian federation.

I thought of all my colleagues who month after month served to represent us, so ready to say at the very beginning of this document that the kind of Senate which they constituted, because they were all appointed, had outlived its usefulness. Not one, long, lingering look came from anyone except Senator Le Moynes.

I know that we are told, "Do not be vain in your own conceits," but, surely, someone would have thought, "You know, there must have been something good since 1867; surely, there was one of us who had some validity, who made some contribution." Perhaps that line was used for grammar or style. For example, Dickens opened the "Tale of Two Cities" with:

It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity,—

He had a balance, and probably it is better to strike for one side, as the committee did, to get attention.

I remember Professor Arthur Phelps, who taught magnificently at what is now the University of Winnipeg, when telling us how to begin a novel. It was quite shocking for those days many years ago. He said the ideal opening is: "Hell," said the duchess; "let go of my leg", because with that you grabbed all these interesting things. In the report the committee started by saying that we are no good, that we have outlived our usefulness. How sad.

Senator Le Moynes made me a bit uncomfortable when he talked about guilt. Guilt is one of those things where, if you get too carried away down the Freudian path, you get into fantasies and follies that are pretty upsetting for some of us who are of middle age. But I drew another form of guilt with my religious upbringing, and that was Calvinism. We were always terrible people, just awful, sinful types and all, even the best people around, were filled with sin according to their own confessions. I refer senators to that delightful creation of a Prince Edward Islander, "Anne of Green Gables." Anne was being chastised by Marilla, who said, "You know, bad people will never prosper, Anne." To which Anne replied, "That is very strange. Mr. Bell, the Sunday school superintendent, is a terrible man and he is getting along all right." Marilla asked, "Anne, why are you saying things like that about Mr. Bell?" "Well," she said, "I heard him yesterday in Sunday school. He stood up and told God that he was a vile sinner, guilty of blackest iniquity." I am not going to load guilt on the Senate members of the committee. I will only say to them that I think they were wrong. I think they gave up too easily and too quickly on the principle of appointments.

It is easy now, apparently, to swallow what Arthur Meighen used to call "some political nostrums"—the idea that there is something about the expression "the elected Senate" that is more "hep," more with it; it will straighten out all the ills of Confederation, if the Senate is elected. I think that a more balanced judgment about this place would have been in place, if I may put it that way. I have been serving the Canadian Senate, and I was studying it long before I came here.

Senator Asselin: You wanted to come.

Senator Macquarrie: I did want to come, and I came with great pleasure and no reluctance. I think I know far more about the Senate than any of these newsmen who will occasionally deign to drop a bit of denigration upon this place. They know nothing about its workings. Do you ever see any of them around? Do you ever hear of them attending a committee meeting, where the work is universally regarded as of a very high calibre? What would they know about the kind of work that is being done here, because they have swallowed the foolish nostrums that this is a place to sleep—not even to dream, just to sleep—made up of "Gerontons," people who are party hacks. One thing that always amuses me is that every time a new batch of appointments is made there are two stories. "They are old bagmen for the party. They are old codgers, old cronies." Then there are always one or two who bring out this kind of story: "If that man lives to be 75, over all this eternity of his growing adolescence he will be paid many millions of dollars." You cannot have it both ways; either you are appointing them too young and keeping them there too long or they are a bunch of old codgers.

The conventional wisdom about the Canadian Senate is to say something dirty about it, something negative. I believe those who know the Senate better—and the committee members must have known it better—could perhaps have stood against that. They would have said that down through the years there have been great people here and they got here by appointment. Would we say that the former distinguished senator, Senator Manning, should have been asked to run in Alberta? Would we say the same thing with respect to Senators Smith and Robichaud? No doubt these people could have won elections; but would it have been wise to deprive the national legislature of Canada of the services of these people? I think not. Would it have been a good thing for Canada if the great Senator Dandurand had never been appointed to the Senate? He did not run for anything, as far as I know. Was it a mistake for the wonderful man Arthur Meighen to be appointed to this Senate and to adorn it with his oratory for years? Should we have written off Eugene Forsey because he failed in an election many years ago? Of course not. That is the kind of thing one can say about the Senate without vain boasting, without any stupid in-house blind loyalty, because it is the truth.

I know there is great criticism every time appointments are made. I think some of these appointments add great lustre to the place. I do not think we have to apologize for the fact that they do not come in through the electoral process. Why was the Senate established in the first place? Was it to be a replica of the lower house? No. The essence of bicameralism is that you have two different chambers. I am an eager young researcher; I try to study as much as I can about bicameralism from James Bryce to Robert MacKay, and I go even further back. As with many things, they say that bicameralism started with the ancient German tribes. The idea was that, if the chiefs looked at it twice and twice agreed on the same point of view, then the people would obey. They looked at it, first, sober and they looked at it, second, drunk. If they came out with a yes, it passed. I am absolutely sure that had nothing to do with the expression "sober second thought."

I think, too, that as in so many of these palliatives we must be more analytic. I notice, and I am not criticizing the man, that Mr. Cosgrove, the joint chairman, said in Charlottetown that through an elected Senate more women would be elected. That sounds fine, does it not? However, there have been elections in the lower house since 1867, yet I do not think there was a single year—in fact, I am sure—when there were not more women in this chamber, both relatively and actually, than there were in the other one. If the elective process gets the women there, then why are they not there now? That is just another bit of seemingly valid argumentation that, regretably, is not so good.

I know there are those who will say that the doctrine of election is the star, the golden gem of the committee's report. I say that it is the opposite. I say that is where they erred most; it was their biggest mistake. Why do I say that? I say that not only can we not embrace duplication but that there is great danger that when or if this house should become an elected one it would be very easy for it to pick up not some of the great qualities of the lower house but some of its worst ones. I served with great pride in the House of Commons for 22 years. I was honoured to be sent there eight times. I have the greatest regard for that chamber. We know where the power is; we know that it is in the "House of Confidence". We know that it is more important than our house in matters of power and related fields. I always thought that in the House of Commons too much time was spent on voting. I remember in 1957, as a new, young, thin man, we had, not the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker but, rather, the Assistant Deputy Speaker presiding over a committee. He made a ruling with respect to procedure. I think Senator Muir will remember it. He ruled that a certain clause was not acceptable. What happened? A motion was put forward to appeal his ruling, and I remember a then young Conservative from Ontario saying that he thought it was a good ruling, that the clause should not have been accepted. That young man was told very quickly from on high, "You go in there and vote with the government. That is what you will do." Can there really be a Conservative point of view with respect to procedure and a Liberal one? I find it incredible that with respect to a matter of interpretation there would be party lines.

I shall never forget one evening in the House of Commons years ago. There is a procedure by which delayed, retarded or collected votes gather up all sorts of amendments and motions, and then in an evening maybe 35 will go through. I looked up at a bunch of young students in the gallery. I do not know whether they were high school or university students. They saw us rising and voting, rising and voting, rising and voting. I looked at the expression that went from one student to another. I had an idea of what they were thinking about these mature representatives of the nation endlessly coming up with 139 to 94 and so forth. We spent two or three hours there in this process. Is it necessary? Will it happen here? Of course it will happen here, because one of the greatest mistakes the committee made was with respect to an elected Senate. On page 3 of the report it is stated:

We also propose that every effort be made to ensure that senators have a significant degree of independence of party.

Then in a following paragraph it is stated:

We recognize that, in the absence of proportional representation for an elected Senate, the political parties will have to work hard to achieve balanced representation from across the country in the Commons and the Senate.

How can they say they are diluting partyism and then, several lines later, say that "the political parties will have to work hard . . ." We know very well that, when an elected Senate is called for, the label of the party will be branded on the forehead of every man who runs—and there will be counting. The Conservatives will get 20 in Quebec and the Liberals will get four. In Alberta the Liberals will get 10 and the Conservatives two, or something along that line. Is it not the case that, instead of attention being focussed on what we are discussing here in the Senate, a good deal of attention will be paid to the vote? How many times have we seen on national television a report regarding a vote with talk about whether the Conservatives lost a vote or the Liberals lost a vote? There is very little talk about what the house was voting on.

In other words, the process of partyism will become predominant—if you will note my alliteration—and therein lies great danger. We know that without parties, parliamentary democracy cannot function. In the last analysis there must be someone who values party more than anything else. Someone once said to John A. Macdonald, "I will stick by you as long as you are right," to which Sir John A. replied, "You cannot run a political party unless someone will stick by you even when you are wrong." So the principle is there that we must have solid parties.

However, something else is also required. If the emphasis was all on party, the governments would never change. That other important factor is independence. Our founding fathers spent a great deal of time on the formation of the Senate and they showed a great deal of wisdom in combining party with independence. If the Senate of Canada has erred in the generations since, it is because its members have not used their independence.

The Report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform tells us that senators will be elected for nine years and that, after that time, they will not run again. That looks to me as if you can get in on promises but you cannot be kicked out on performance—and cannot be re-elected on it either.

It seems to me that the object of the exercise is to downgrade partyism and inculcate strength and independence. However, if we are to be logical, that object would be better served if senators were not elected in the first place.

Historically, we are told that people are appointed to the Senate to exercise independence. The practicality of this view is reflected in the fact that, in the Senate, we have fewer votes and, as long as we are not wearing heavy party labels around our necks, that luxury will prevail. Also, in the Senate we do not spend a great deal of time talking procedure. Personally, I have never heard a procedural argument that ever did the country much good or, indeed, the people who listened to it. Another area in which the Senate differs from the House of Commons is that, in the Commons, there is a relentless scoring of points.

There are several things in the suggestions of the committee that trouble me. In my view, much more reflection must go into the appointment of senators on a linguistic basis. I confess that I am myself unilingual. I am sorry about it, but I am now too old to correct it. However, I would not like to be told that, on a matter respecting language, I would be less sensitive to the rights of Canadians because I do not speak two or three languages, although I respect people who are linguistically gifted. There was an old saying that philosophers should be kings, and I am not sure that, in this instance, we should make the translators kings. This whole issue, in my view, needs a great deal more thought. If I were a francophone member of the House of Commons and I saw that, in the Senate, there was a membership which had greater authority than I, then I would indeed be concerned.

There is another matter which Senator Phillips mentioned to me on the day that this report was issued and that is: How would the election of senators affect the passage of money bills? If senators became the people's representatives, would they have the power to amend, and perhaps even originate, money bills in the Senate? That, too, is a matter that requires very serious reconsideration.

Honourable senators may have discerned, in my remarks, a lack of enthusiasm for the report of this committee. If that is the reading, then it is a correct one. I believe that this report will not take effect. I cannot believe that this report will have great priority, as Premier Peckford said. If that brilliant young leader of my party, the Honourable Brian Mulroney, becomes Prime Minister of Canada within a year, there will be so many other enormous things for him to do that Senate reform will probably not find a place within his top 25 priorities. In the case of a new Liberal leader, whoever is chosen, I cannot see that Senate reform will be his first priority either. I do not see any great conversions among the premiers, and, therefore, I am not expecting that Senate reform will take place. I did not appear before the committee, because, at the time, I said that I resented the suggestion that two houses be involved in a question dealing with the reform of only one of them. I thought that was inappropriate. I think so still, and that marred my appearance before that committee. However, I appreciate very much the courtesy with which the co-chairman, Senator Molgat, handled relations with the rest of the Senate. I commend him and all who served with him for their diligence and hard work. If on several measures they were wrong, that is a prerogative which is extended to all of us and which all of us exercise from time to time.

On motion of Senator Denis, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, on February 23 last, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, I introduced the following motion:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which was authorized by the Senate on January 19, 1984, to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc., be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada for the purpose of such inquiry.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Since that motion was introduced, my committee has received an invitation from Amtrak to visit their facilities. In accordance with that invitation, and with leave of the Senate, I move that the original wording of that motion be modified in the last line as follows:

—be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada and to Washington, D.C., Beech Grove, Indiana and Chicago, Illinois.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1650)

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, on February 28 the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications was informed by Mr. Jim Barber, Manager of State-Community Affairs for Amtrak, that Amtrak would be more than willing to host the committee for meetings on Amtrak's operations, structural set up and costing procedures in Washington, D.C.

The program of the visit will be as follows: Amtrak's legislative establishment and mandate, including its accountability to government, its funding basis—for example, its debt, subsidies received—and its structural organization; its present situation, including share of the market, growth of ridership since Amtrak's creation, financial situation, route structure, types of services provided—for example, high speed and tour packages—and train control; the railbed ownership, including the number of rail lines owned by Amtrak versus the number it contracts to use from other railways and the method by which it acquired railbed ownership; its costing procedures, including how Amtrak negotiates operating contracts for the use of other railways rail lines and maintenance facilities; equipment ownership, including the number and types of train equipment owned by Amtrak; train car rebuilding and equipment maintenance, including Amtrak's train car rebuilding and maintenance program and facilities; and future planning, including Amtrak's plans for route structure, new equipment, funding and marketing strategies.

The officials from Amtrak have also invited us to ride on its high speed inter-city service between New York and Washington, D.C. They have also invited us to inspect Amtrak's train car rebuilding facilities at Beech Grove, Indiana, and to inspect Amtrak's switching, train control and maintenance facilities in Chicago, Illinois.

This invitation was received by the committee after Amtrak officials were informed and almost every member of the committee had expressed a desire to contact them in order to benefit from their experience. One matter of particular importance to the consideration of the committee is the costing procedure used by Amtrak. Since we have a similar problem in Canada in regard to CP- and CN-owned tracks, we think that we would benefit considerably from a study of their costing procedure. That is quite an acute problem in Canada insofar as VIA Rail's costing procedure is concerned.

During the last session of Parliament, when the late Senator G. I. Smith was the chairman of the committee, the committee held many meetings on the subject of costing bills. At that time the members of the committee expressed a desire to study the procedure used by Amtrak.

As you are aware, honourable senators, Amtrak has been operating for several years and apparently is doing very well. Consequently, I think that this would be of great benefit to our committee and I request the support of the Senate for this tour of Amtrak's facilities.

Hon. Martial Asselin: We are not opposed to the motion put by the chairman of the committee, but I do not know whether this was discussed with the Leader of the Opposition. He is not present in the chamber now, so I wonder if we could postpone the adoption of this motion until I have had an opportunity to discuss this matter with him. If this is not urgent, I suggest that this be adjourned to the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Langlois: I did not discuss this with the Leader of the Opposition, but the deputy chairman, Senator Balfour, is well acquainted with our proposal. If I remember correctly, he was one of those who proposed this visit.

The problem is that I need to have the budget for this trip approved by the Internal Economy Committee and I cannot appear before that committee until this motion has been adopted by the Senate. The budget is now in the hands of the administrative branch of the Senate.

Senator Asselin: When are you scheduled to appear before that committee?

Senator Langlois: I am scheduled to appear before that committee on Tuesday next at 10 a.m. That is why I am pressed for time.

Furthermore, the officials from Amtrak have asked for at least three weeks' notice so that they can arrange the trip. That, in itself, will postpone the trip to the end of March or perhaps to the beginning of April.

Senator Asselin: Since you have discussed this matter with the deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Balfour, and he has agreed that this trip is required in order to improve the knowledge of the committee, I am prepared to give consent.

Senator Langlois: I see that Senator Macdonald is nodding his head in agreement.

Senator Asselin: I did not consult him.

Senator Langlois: But he is a member of the committee.

Senator Asselin: I know that.

Motion, as modified, agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, March 8, 1984, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 8, 1984

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.
Prayers.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's sixth report approving the budget of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

(For text of report see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

NATIONAL FINANCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE TO COMPLETE EXAMINATION COMMENCED IN PRECEDING SESSION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, March 13, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to complete its examination of the role of the Federal Government in generating economic development through technological change, begun under its examination of the Main Estimates 1982-83, tabled in the Senate on 23rd February, 1982;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 13, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether there is any legislation to come before the Senate next week.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had passed to me a note expressing some expectations or hopes with respect to legislation, but I do not seem to have it in front of me now. Perhaps the Acting Deputy Leader of the Government can deal with the matter.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, a note has just been given to me which indicates that there are the last two of the group of private bills which, if enacted, would exempt the petitioners from the public general law relating to marriage. That is all the information I have.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing coming to us from the House of Commons?

Senator Langlois: No.
Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the new low reached by the Canadian dollar in comparison to the U.S. dollar over the past 23 months and the decision of the Bank of Canada to increase the bank rate from 10.07 to 10.20 per cent, has the government leader any comment to make on the prospects with regard to the value of the Canadian dollar and interest rates?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it would be inappropriate for any member of the government to attempt to forecast what the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the American dollar is going to be, but an analysis of the situation is fairly clear to anyone who has an interest in these things. There has been a change in relative interest rates recently in Canada and the United States that obviously has an effect on the demand for conversion into Canadian or United States dollars. The adjustment that was made by the Bank of Canada earlier today is also a reflection of that factor. We have expressed the hope on a number of occasions that interest rates will not begin another rise to the point where they interfere significantly in the economic recovery that has been ongoing for many months, because certainly there is a direct relationship between those two factors as well. To answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition directly as to what the prognosis of this is, I think it would be inappropriate to make a comment on that.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NEWFOUNDLAND—ANNUAL SEAL HUNT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the impending east coast seal hunt. Yesterday in the newspaper there were two conflicting statements on it, one by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the other by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs is reported as indicating with regard to the controversial Newfoundland seal hunt:

We (the government) haven't reached any decisions yet but we are considering what we ought to do—

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was reported in another newspaper article as saying in the House of Commons:

Ottawa won't cave in to "despicable criminals" and end the East Coast seal hunt this year . . . The hunt will go ahead this year although on a much reduced scale from the past, . . .

Could the Leader of the Government resolve that conflict or relate the correct information to us, because I am sure the sealers in Newfoundland will be anxious for that information?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regarding the construction that is put on those two statements, it requires a very vivid imagination to assume that there is a conflict between them, because it suggests that there is more behind the statements than was expressed. While Senator Marshall, or anyone else who wishes to, can do that, I think we ought to ask those who made the statements to give an explanation, if an additional explanation is required.

To answer the latter part of his question, I give him the undertaking that I shall make the inquiries.

Senator Marshall: The Leader of the Government always takes my questions as being devoid of the sincerity with which they are expressed. We know that the government supports the seal hunt. I am only seeking information, as a representative in the Senate of my region.

Senator Olson: Senator Marshall should not be so sensitive. His preamble to the question was whether I could reconcile the difference between the two statements. I listened carefully to the statements and I could not find any contradiction in them.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

USE OF AMERICAN AIRCRAFT FOR FIRE-FIGHTING OPERATIONS IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question deals with a news release dated March 5 in which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, on behalf of the Minister of Supply and Services, announced that the Government of Canada awarded two contracts totalling $1.75 million for fire-bombing operations in the Northwest Territories. All of the aircraft listed in the news release are of American manufacture. Is there any specific reason why American-made aircraft are required to be used in the Northwest Territories as opposed to Canadian-made aircraft?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is another of those questions where there is incomplete information. If these are fixed-wing aircraft, then there is one set of circumstances, but a great many fire control operations are now undertaken by helicopters. While we have come a long way in setting up a helicopter manufacturing industry in Canada, we do not yet have one. So in connection with contracts that involve rotary-wing aircraft, obviously the aircraft must come from outside of Canada.

Senator Phillips: I am happy to inform the minister that the aircraft used are fixed-wing aircraft—the four-engine DC-6 air tanker and the two-engine Douglas A-26.

Considering the amount of money that the Minister of State for Social Development has poured into Canadair, could the government not have considered the Canadair CL-215 instead of American-made aircraft, or does the government not have the same opinion of Canadair as does the minister?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, anyone who does a reasonable assessment of the relative merits of water-bombing aircraft will know that the Canadair CL-215 is one of the best, and has been recognized as such, for that purpose manufactured anywhere in the world. Senator Phillips perhaps does not recognize that there may be a number of other factors in the contract, and, of course, that is the part that he left out. I am not saying that he did that deliberately. Perhaps he is not aware of the other factors that determine the awarding of these contracts. However, I will look into it and will provide him with further information.

Senator Phillips: Would the Leader of the Government inquire if any of the proposals studied by the two departments included the CL-215 as the aircraft to be utilized rather than the American-made aircraft?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall look into that. However, the answer may be far more encompassing than that simple factor in the total of what was considered in awarding the contracts.

TRANSPORTATION

SENIOR GRAIN TRANSPORTATION COMMITTEE—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on February 14, 1984.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He is not here. It should wait until next week.

Senator Argue: Senator Roblin will read it in Hansard. I will give the answer now.

Senator Asselin: But he may have questions on it.

Senator Argue: Senator Roblin asked a question on February 14 regarding the terms of reference of the Senior Grain Transportation Committee. Section 12 of the Western Grain Transportation Act specifically sets out that the committee is to "advise and make recommendations to the minister or administrator on any matters affecting transportation, shipping or handling of grain." This clearly puts the committee in an advisory role and therefore it has no executive capacity, as the honourable senator may have felt was inferred from his reading of the booklet entitled What Does the Western Grain Transportation Act Mean to Western Grain Producers.

I have re-examined this booklet, which was issued by the Minister of Transport, and it clearly states that the committee's powers are solely to make recommendations. The Western Grain Transportation Act does not alter the roles or the functions of either the Canadian Wheat Board or the Canadian Grain Commission.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (JOSEPH ROLAND RÉJEAN DAOUST AND MARIE LISE SYLVIE GIRARD)—SECOND READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-8, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Joseph Roland Réjean Daoust and Marie Lise Sylvie Girard.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that, when I addressed the House on February 2 in the context of moving second reading of Bill S-3, I indicated to you that Bills S-2 to S-5, each concerned with a couple related by consanguinity, would be followed by four more bills, each concerned with a couple related by affinity. Of this latter group of petitions and bills, we have already seen fit to pass Bills S-6 and S-7 on second reading and to send them to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Today I propose to you that we do the same for Bills S-8 and S-9.

Honourable senators may well feel some reluctance in acting on two more of these marriage exemption bills when they know that six have already been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[Senator Olson.]

As you know, that Committee is waiting to hear the government's position from the Minister of Justice and Attorney-General with respect to both the desirability of amending the public general law of Canada in this area and the desirability of granting exemptions in particular cases by private Act.

Notwithstanding this natural reluctance, I urge that these two bills be passed and sent to Committee. My reasons for so urging you are twofold.

Firstly, there is the issue of natural justice to the parties. In the case of these last two bills, as in the case of the previous ones, most of the preliminary procedures had been carried out prior to the tabling of the first petition in the present group of eight bills. Time has been expended. Costs have been incurred. Hopes are high. And they are reasonable hopes in the light of the precedents.

Secondly, there is the question of balance. As I have already mentioned, Bills S-8 and S-9 complete a group of four bills, each concerned with two persons related by affinity.

This group of four bills complements the first group of four bills, that is, Bills S-2 to S-5, each of which is concerned with two persons related by consanguinity. In my view, the Committee will be helped, not hindered, by having before it Bills S-8 and S-9. The bills will add to the balance of the six already before the Committee and will thereby help the Committee to clearly focus its perspective on the question before it.

If honourable senators do see fit to accede to my suggestion that these bills be passed on second reading and referred to Committee, they will have my undertaking that, in this session, I will not sponsor any more petitions of this nature until the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has reported on the eight bills of this nature now before it and on the related motion to study the subject matter of the law.

Turning now to Bill S-8 in particular, the petitioners in this case are Joseph Roland Réjean Daoust and Marie Lise Sylvie Girard. Mr. Daoust is a divorced man, the ex-husband of one Lise Girard, who is the sister of the petitioning Miss Girard's father. It follows that Mr. Daoust is Miss Girard's uncle by marriage.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): By marriage.

Senator Leblanc: By marriage.

Hon. Martial Asselin: No, by affinity.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: So there is no consanguinity.

Senator Leblanc: He is Miss Girard's uncle by affinity, not by consanguinity.

Senator Tremblay: Related by affinity.

Senator Leblanc: The lawyers wrote "by marriage", but perhaps that is not quite the correct term.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: May I ask a question?

Senator Leblanc: Certainly.

Senator Deschatelets: Do you know whether Réjean Daoust and Sylvie Girard tried to get married before the authorities and were denied permission?

Senator Leblanc: I do not know about that, but I am sure that in Committee we will be able to get all the details on the various problems existing for each couple.

Senator Deschatelets: They are not related by consanguinity.

Senator Leblanc: No, they are not.

Honourable senators, I move that Bill S-8 be read a second time so that it can subsequently be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Thank you.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to reiterate what I said previously about the Bills presented earlier before this Chamber, and the major objections I expressed on my own behalf and on behalf of my Party. There is also the fact that since 1978, the Minister of Justice has not given us a reply on the feasibility of amending the general law. Considering the multitude of marriage exemption Bills that come before the Senate, the Official Opposition maintains the same principles it has been defending and which apply, mutatis mutandis, to this Bill as well.

We have no objection to seeing the Bill passed on second reading. However, we repeat that we do not agree to the Bill being examined in Committee before the Minister of Justice has appeared before the Committee to let us know whether he intends to amend the general law to include these exemption Acts.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Senator Asselin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this Bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

MARRIAGE LAW EXEMPTION (PEARL KIM LEE AND THOMAS SIEGFRIED WIELAND)—SECOND READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-9, to provide an exception from the public general law relating to marriage in the case of Pearl Kim Lee and Thomas Siegfried Wieland.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Very well, but the same remarks apply for the same reasons as in the case of the other Bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall the Bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st, January, 1984.—
(Honorable Senator Denis, P.C.)

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, there is talk of reform of the Marriage Act as well as reform of the Senate. Reform is fashionable nowadays. We don't know what will happen with the Marriage Act reform; however, there is also talk of Senate reform. Sometimes, it can be costly to be fashionable, as married people know full well! In the course of my brief remarks, I will try to show whether Senate reform would be costly.

Honourable Senators, the Co-Chairman of the Joint Committee on Senate Reform, our Speaker pro tempore who honours us with his presence today, has clearly indicated that this Senate reform had to be considered in its entirety, that the measures proposed in this report could not be taken in isolation.

The report says:

Our proposals for the design of an elected Senate are interdependent, and it is important that they be considered together.

This is very important. From the outset, I noticed that the Committee's most important recommendation is that senators be elected directly.

I submit that this measure, in the present context, is inappropriate and unfair. Given the significance of the matter, I will simply underline a few negative effects of such a radical change. The Senate was established in 1867 to serve two main functions: to protect and represent interests of special groups, as was stated by Sir John A. Macdonald, that is, interests of a region or a linguistic or religious group. These are more commonly referred to by the Committee as "regional interests".

In the first days of Confederation, the structure of the Senate reflected its role as guardian of regional or minority group interests, which many fail to distinguish. It is for this reason that an equal number of senators were appointed and not elected for each of the three senatorial divisions: Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces. Later on, western Canada became the fourth division. As is stated in the Committee report, this was done in order to protect not only the less populated provinces, but also the French-speaking province of Quebec.

According to historians, this kind of representation in the Upper Chamber was the sine qua non condition for the acceptance of the election of federal members of Parliament according to population.

With an elected Senate, this protection initially extended to minority groups disappears, there is no longer counterbalance to the House of Commons. And what about the western and the Maritime provinces, which claim they are under-represented, and the minority groups who feel neglected? I would be happy to agree to an increase in the number of senators in these areas if the Joint Committee did not propose to do so at the expense of the French-speaking minority. The number of senators from Quebec would not increase, staying at 24. Given the present number of senators, which is 104, the numerical influence of francophones is 23 per cent. By increasing the total number of senators to 144, this proportion is reduced to 16 per cent, while it was 33 per cent at the beginning of Confederation.

Moreover, by creating senatorial constituencies for the election of senators, the numerical influence of ethnic minority groups, be they cultural, religious or linguistic, which are not strongly concentrated, would be reduced to practically nothing.

Yet, under the system of an appointed Senate, and considering Quebec only, we have Honourable Senators Kolber, Watt, Rizzuto, Gigantes, Molson, Wood, Lapointe, Rousseau and many others. Could Quebec have a better representation in an elected Senate?

Honourable senators, to give you an idea of the limited influence Francophones and other ethnic groups outside Quebec would exert when electing senators, predominantly anglophone senatorial constituencies would have up to three times as many electors as ridings which elect members of Parliament.

I am now thinking of my friend Senator Molgat who is acting today as Speaker pro tempore. I wonder if in spite of his qualifications, his ability and his experience, he could be elected in his area in Manitoba. However, we could say that in his case, he would have set his own interests aside. Any other French-speaking candidate would not be more successful. The Joint Committee states that to protect minorities a committee of both Houses would carve out some special constituencies.

I respectfully submit that depending on the circumstances, the party in power, the attitude of the people in the areas to be delineated, there is virtually no chance of establishing an adequate and satisfactory division, and it is to be feared that such a division would give rise to unfairness, worries and partiality. For example, a decision would have to be made about the number of such constituencies to be set up; a selection would have to be made of the ethnic groups covered and the parts of the country where those senatorial divisions would be located.

[Senator Denis.]

[English]

Honourable senators, an elected Senate would create an injustice to the appointed senators. One-third of the initial group of senators from each province would be elected first, one-third after three years and, finally, the last third after six years. Some senators have been appointed for life, while others until the age of 75. They have acquired rights which will thus be taken away from them without regard to the unfair consequences. Who will retire first and who will retire last? No doubt injustices and discrimination will be created whether we like it or not.

At page 40 we read that every effort should be made to take account of the preferences of individual senators, and the same terms should apply to all. If everyone has the same privileges, how can the same be applied to all?

Further on in the report it is stated:

The choice of which constituencies would elect senators at the first, second and third Senate elections would be made by the body entrusted with drawing the constituency boundaries.

Where are the privileges to be found under those circumstances?

Still further on in the report it is stated that only eight vacancies would be required to make way for the 48 senators who would join the Senate in the first election. That is contrary to what was stated above, that is, that one third of the senators for each province retire elected at the first senatorial election. One third in respect of Ontario is eight; one third in respect of Quebec is eight as well. On the first ballot one third of the senators from each province will have to retire, not just eight in total. If one supposes that those 40 new senators will be elected in the first election, then every province will lose one third of its senators just the same.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is unbearable.

Senator Denis: At the end of the same paragraph it is said that in ten years 60 per cent of the actual senators might disappear. If there are 11 lifers at the present time and they are between 75 and 90 years of age, I do not know how many will be left ten years from now.

Senator Flynn: You will be here!

Senator Denis: It is possible to put them aside, but they will be put aside by themselves.

[Translation]

Many of these senators to be retired have rendered great services but they will have to leave just the same. They will have been part of a Senate which has been praised for the excellent performance of its various committees and its valuable inquiries. Those tributes are to be found on pages 11, 12, 38, and 41 in the report. I did not look any further, because the entire report speaks very highly of the present Senate. The fact remains that senators will have to retire and will be replaced by individuals who will be unknown quantities. I doubt very much that an elected Senate could have as many representatives of an equal or superior quality to that of the existing Senate because, in many cases, they will be elected thanks to their own popularity or the support of their party rather than for their ability or their special qualifications. With regard to the influence of parties we would be gullible to think that senators could be elected without the support of political parties. If we object to the partisanship of the existing Senate, an elected senator would be still more accountable and grateful to his party which would get involved in the elections and contribute towards election expenditures.

Is the Senate too costly? According to the recommendation of the Joint Committee, expenditures would increase. Some 40 additional senators would have to be paid as well as the election expenditures every three years.

I am advised by someone who is knowledgeable that such elections would cost the government $30 million every three years.

An average of 30 per cent of the population did not vote at the last three federal elections. How many would vote if senators were elected, when the powers of the Senate, as stated in the report, would be less than those of the House of Commons?

After a nine-year term, the elected senator would probably be granted a pension. There is such reference in the report. I would like to point out that he could be 40 years of age. It would be more costly than in the case of senators of 75 or 80 years of age. We would pay the pension longer than at present. It would be perpetual and every three years, a third of the senators would retire. In addition to that discrimination, the elected senator would have to give up his profession or his trade and start over again nine years later, which would be difficult, or he could undertake a second career which would be still more difficult. It would be nonsensical to elect senators for a nine-year term. At least, if it had been decided that this nine-year term would come in the end decreeing 65 as the age limit for senators by appointing them at age 50, then they could spend their time leisurely or go to Florida, without having to find another job. After a number of years, the cost could be substantial. Added to that, finally, is the cost of compensating the 104 current members of the Senate who would have to make room for the elected members of the Senate. We would have to pay pensions to the new senators who retire after a nine-year period, as well as to all of us who are here now. Pensions would be paid to the new senators as well as the current senators who would have to go. To this we must add the recommendation for personal services to the 144 new senators, both here and back home, as is the case for members of the other place—offices, secretaries, etc. That is not the way to alleviate criticism to the effect that the Senate is costing too much money.

Just a word concerning the double majority granted to Francophones on legislation dealing with linguistic issues. This reform seems generous, for on such issues it could favour francophones from Quebec; yet, these would be losing at the same time the support of Francophones outside Quebec, because with the proposed reform of an elected Senate, very few of them would be elected.

I repeat that the advantage of this double majority would apply only to legislation dealing with linguistic issues; but for the rest, which accounts for 99.9 per cent of the Senate's activities, the numerical influence of Francophones would be reduced from 23 per cent to 16 per cent, without any senators to represent Francophones outside Quebec.

Honourable senators, a number of committee members and important witnesses have indicated that no amendment to the Constitution should be adopted, in the current context, without the agreement of the Quebec National Assembly, even if the majority required by the Constitution accepted such an amendment without Quebec's support, something which could happen.

This reform, in my opinion, would provide considerable ammunition to the Quebec Separatists, and I think that the other Quebec political parties would also object to it.

Some reform proposals contained in the preliminary report could be carried out unopposed or without resorting to a constitutional amendment. Arrangements between government leaders could easily lead to still more judicious appointments, less open to criticism, if possible, which would not make up an elected Senate.

Honourable senators, I am opposed, therefore, to all the reform proposals recommended by the joint committee as long as they remain an integral part, as the joint chairman said, a complete unit, as stated in the report, of the system of an elective Senate.

On motion of Senator Robichaud, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Molson calling the attention of the Senate to certain activities of the National Film Board and, in particular, to the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am standing this order, but perhaps I should explain my reasons for doing so. Today I received a letter and a rather lengthy memorandum from the Acting Commissioner of the National Film Board. It was posted on February 24 but it only arrived today. I have to consider that memorandum and have sent copies of it to other senators who are particularly interested. I also want to hear the comments of Group Captain Bauer. In due course, I shall proceed with the debate.

Order stands.

ECONOMIC REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT— MOTION FOR ADDRESS ADOPTED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of February 21, 1984, moved:

That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, meetings, telegrams, etc., between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland with respect to an Economic Regional Development Agreement, and any subsidiary agreements, including priorities and the amount of each.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—FISHING AND EXPLORATION RIGHTS—MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Motion:

That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all papers between the Government of Canada and the Government of France with respect to the negotiations on fishing and oil exploration rights as they relate to St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I received a call from the Department of External Affairs on Tuesday indicating that the information I had requested is classified. They said that I could be given a briefing at any time on the important matters addressed in this motion having to do with the tabling of documents "between the Government of Canada and the Government of France with respect to the negotiations on fishing and oil exploration rights as they relate to St. Pierre and Miquelon."

I would agree to withdrawing that motion in favour of having the briefing with the Department of External Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE EFFECTS OF OIL EXPLORATION ON FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of February 21, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine the effects of oil exploration on the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE EXAMINATION OF ONGOING EFFECTS OF RESTRUCTURING ON FISHING INDUSTRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of February 21, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry be authorized to examine the ongoing effects of the restructuring of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the fishing industry in Canada has been one that has experienced a never-ending series of problems over the years, which problems have been studied to death and band-aided by successive governments through various ad hoc emergency measures. It is almost impossible to believe that a renewable resource of such value has had such ups and downs over the years, with no solutions.

Despite its nutritional and economic value, we have failed to increase its demand domestically, and yet world demand for fish is expected to almost double by the year 2000. We not only cannot sell our fish but we are also so inept in our marketing and processing of it that we have to import $350 million worth of fish a year, much of it our own, processed in foreign countries and sold back to Canada.

Every known approach has been suggested for finding solutions to support the economic and social well-being of many thousands of fishermen on both the east and west coasts of Canada. Despite the implementation of the recommendations of the Kirby task force, problems persist, problems such as the allocation of zones and quotas, licensing, marketing, unemployment insurance regulations for fishermen, harvesting, price support, jurisdiction over the resource to the 200-mile limit, as well as those problems which affect the inshore fishermen versus their offshore counterpart, not to mention the plant workers and independent processors.

The latest solution to the almost total collapse of the industry is the restructuring that is now taking place following the Kirby report. Without taking away from the work of the task force, there is evidence of deep division over the fact that it has not answered the problems of the industry, even to the point where massive campaigns are building up in protest.

The answer, in my opinion and as I expressed in the motion, is that the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee be authorized to examine the ongoing effects of the restructuring of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada—and, I repeat, "ongoing effects"—effects that will be ongoing for many months and years. I think that this restructuring is a turning point in the history of the industry, and it requires a committee such as the one which was recently expanded to include fisheries and through which this chamber can contribute a great deal by way of examining and taking up regional interests on both our coasts on a continuing basis.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 13, 1984, at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL FINANCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)a, I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit at 3 p.m. on Thursday, March 15, 1984, while the Senate is sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think before we consider the question of leave we ought to allow the mover to give us an explanation as to why leave is required.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have received a memorandum from the clerk of the committee, explaining that arrangements have been made to have the minister, Senator Austin, appear before the committee in order to examine the votes that come under his jurisdiction, and that 3 p.m. was the most convenient time both for the committee and for Senator Austin. That is why I moved this motion.

It would perhaps be appropriate for Senator Doody, as chairman of the committee, to add further explanations if he wishes to do so.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, there is little that I can add. Members of the committee felt that it would be of advantage to the chamber, and for purposes of public information generally, if Senator Austin were given an opportunity to appear before the committee and explain the additional $550 million requested by Canadair and de Havilland this year. Senator Austin agreed to do so, but Thursday afternoon was the only time he had available. With that in mind, the committee has no alternative but to tailor its meeting to suit the time that the minister could find for this.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have had the advantage of discussion with my colleague who has just spoken with respect to this resolution, so I understand the reasons that have moved the committee to ask for this authorization. I do not intend to oppose the motion, but it seems to me that I should ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to look again at this question of committee meetings.

This becomes a weekly ritual. I do not intend to give it up, as long as there is a need for it. We have decided that the Senate will not sit on Wednesday afternoons so as to provide time for committee meetings. Lo and behold, what happens? As far as I am aware, there is only one committee meeting scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, and that is the meeting of the National Defence Committee at 4 o'clock.

Hon. Jack Marshall: It meets again at 9 o'clock on Thursday morning.

Senator Roblin: As my honourable friend Senator Marshall reminds me, the National Defence Committee meets again on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock; the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee meets that morning at 9.30; and the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee meets Thursday at 11.15 a.m. Now the National Finance Committee is scheduled to meet at 3 o'clock Thursday afternoon.

Honourable senators, surely we can arrange our affairs a little better than that so as not to have this overlapping of the meetings of two important committees. For the reasons I have stated on numerous occasions, this places a hardship upon the opposition.

I wonder whether my honourable friend would undertake to consult with the chairmen of these committees before the end of the day to see whether some of these meetings could not be moved forward to Wednesday afternoon. We could then conduct our business in a more orderly manner. It would also make it far easier for the attendance of opposition senators, who are pretty sparse on the ground these days, unfortunately. We look forward to a change but we never know, the situation being what it is. The opposition cannot man these committees if they meet at the same time. I know that my honourable friend has a lot of sympathy for me in this regard. He has soothed me on many occasions with respect to this matter, but he does not get anything done, as far as I can see. Perhaps I am being a little hard on him, but I give him an opportunity now to try to rearrange the meetings of these committees so as to make use of our free Wednesday afternoons and to reduce some of the pressure on Thursdays.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I hope that Senator Roblin will not take it as only soothing when I encourage him not to give up raising this question. As he has said, the idea of sitting only on Tuesdays and Thursdays, thereby leaving Wednesday afternoons free, was designed precisely to leave more time for the committees to meet. I hope, therefore, that the committee chairmen who are in the chamber now are paying attention. I hope that those who are not present, who, of course, always carefully read Senate Debates when they are not here, will note that that is the reason for this arrangement.

Next week, or more likely in two weeks, I propose to have a meeting with the Senate committee chairmen. I say now that, if it should turn out that those committee chairmen are not prepared to support this plan, then we might as well resume the sittings of the Senate on Wednesday afternoons. It is my hope that the plan works, but it will not work unless the committee chairmen consult with each other and with me about the timing of their meetings and use Wednesday afternoons. We have entered another trial period for this system. If the time available on Wednesday afternoons is not made use of, then the system will change and it will be even more difficult for the committee chairmen to avoid the undesirable overlapping of meetings that has been pointed out by Senator Roblin.

This may be soothing to Senator Roblin, but I hope that it is not soothing to the committee chairmen.

Senator Roblin: If I may be permitted, I should like to offer a comment on my honourable friend's laudable efforts to calm me on this issue. I thank him for what he said, but I point out that there has already been a meeting of the committee chairmen, as a result of which a tentative schedule of committee meetings was established. Why is that not being adhered to? That is a question I believe should be examined now.

● (1410)

While I appreciate the fact that my honourable friend intends to do something about it at some time, I would like to know if he can do anything to help us regarding this overlapping of committees next Thursday morning.

Senator Frith: Two points arise out of that question. The first is: Why is the schedule that was set up not being observed? I also seek an answer to that, because it ought to be observed. That is why I hope the chairmen of committees are paying attention. On the other point, I will try to find out if we can do anything about the committees scheduled for this week, and will undertake to see if we can arrange for some meetings to be held tomorrow afternoon that are now scheduled in that overlapping position we find so undesirable.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH SERVICES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-3

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-3, intituled: "An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto;

[Senator Frith.]

That the committee have power to travel from place to place within Canada; and

That the committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before leave is granted, I should like to know if it is the intention of the committee to meet this week.

Senator Frith: According to my information, the committee is scheduled to meet only to discuss future business. I assume it is for the purpose of discussing future plans for this reference if it is accepted.

Senator Roblin: That is quite in order, but it is my view that we should deal with this matter in the normal course, on Thursday. We can accept this as being a notice of motion and deal with it on Thursday. If there is no intention of bringing the bill before the committee this week, then nothing is lost.

Senator Frith: That is agreed. Therefore, perhaps this could be taken as a notice of motion for Thursday.

INCOME TAX

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be deemed to have been authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel for any studies it undertook with respect to Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971".

Honourable senators, by way of explanation, my reason for moving this motion is that when the Senate referred Bill C-2 to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, by an oversight the normal authority that it has, and has always been given over the years, to hire technical personnel to assist it in the examination of the amendments to the Income Tax Act, was not included in the motion. Therefore, the purpose of this motion is to remedy that oversight.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is likely to get tired of me this afternoon. Here is another instance of leave being sought. The motion has not been printed, so far as I know. I have heard it read, but it does not appear on the Order Paper or on the Clerk's Scroll. I do not know whether other members of the Senate are quicker on the uptake than I am, but it seems to me that it should at least be printed before we are asked to vote on it. There is no pressing urgency with respect to the matter. It is a routine matter—I am forced to admit that—and under normal circumstances, if it were printed, I would be disposed to grant leave. But would not my honourable friend consider it better to have it printed before we are asked to vote on it?

● (1420)

Senator Frith: I am not sure I understand what my honourable friend means about having the motion printed. Of course, none of the motions I presented is actually printed on the Order Paper yet.

Senator Roblin: They are in the Scroll, though.

Senator Frith: Yes, they are in the Scroll. As to the explanation I gave earlier, admittedly on very short notice, to my honourable friend as to why the motion did not appear on the Scroll, I thought I had elaborated on it in my explanation to all honourable senators a moment ago. However, I do not think there is any urgency to having it today. In any event, it is clear that leave is not granted and, therefore, it shall be moved on Thursday.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, March 15, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE

RULE 104—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding with Question Period, last week the Speaker of the Senate was asked to rule on a matter, and I am ready to give my ruling.

On the sixth of this month, in answer to a question put to him by Senator Phillips, Senator Austin replied as follows:

"I will be appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts and its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with detailed reports on the financial affairs of Canada . . ."

and, further on Senator Austin repeated that statement as follows:

"I will be making an extensive statement in the other place before the end of this month."

Then, Senator Flynn expressed surprise and Senator Tremblay put the following question to the Deputy Leader of the Government concerning the application of Rule 104:

"Under that Rule, a senator must have leave of the Senate to appear before a committee of the House of Commons. In this case, does Senator Austin need leave of the Senate to appear before a committee of the House of Commons which is considering problems in the field for which he is responsible as a member of the Cabinet?"

Following debate on the question, Senator Asselin asked the Speaker's opinion in the following terms:

"Following what has been said by the minister, I think we should ask His Honour the Speaker to refer to the precedent set during the previous session. In reading the decision given by that Speaker, you should, Your Honour, render a judgment, if you so wish."

Senator Asselin was referring to a debate held on November 15, 1979. The then Speaker did not have to make a ruling, since the following motion, as reported on p. 351 of the Debates of the Senate for the year 1979, was adopted by the Senate on the same day:

"That notwithstanding any interpretation that may be made of Rule 104, permission be granted to the three Senators who are members of the ministry and have departmental responsibilities to respond to requests to appear before Committees of the House of Commons until such time as a ruling may be made by the Chair or a decision reached by the Senate on the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders."

Paragraph 1 of Rule 104, which was then the subject-matter of the debate, states as follows:

"When the House of Commons requests that a senator or any of the officers, clerks, or servants of the Senate attend before the House of Commons to be examined or appear before any committee thereof, such request shall be by Message from the House of Commons requesting that the Senate grant leave to such senator, officer, clerk or servant to attend."

On November 22, 1979, the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders recommended to the Senate that Rule 104 be amended by adding the following paragraph:

"In the absence of a Message referred to in subsection (1), a senator who so desires may voluntarily appear before any committee of the House of Commons."

This is now paragraph 4 of Rule 104.

The Senate amended its Rules accordingly through a motion adopted on December 4, 1979, as found on page 487 of the Debates of the Senate for the year 1979.

Thus, the situation today is not the same as it was at the time of the November 15, 1979, debate referred to by Senator Asselin.

Senator Austin told us that he would appear before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the House of Commons. Rule 104 of our Standing Rules allows him to do so voluntarily. That is my ruling.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

DROUGHT IN THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES—ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. In fact, my purpose is mainly to obtain information and ascertain the Canadian Government's position on a major problem in Africa, where we have an extremely serious situation.

In the Sahel countries, which include the Cape Verde Islands, Gambia, Upper Volta, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Senegal and Chad, drought conditions have progressed to the extent that entire herds are dying because of lack of water. When we realize that the Sahara Desert is advancing at the rate of six kilometers per year in these regions, it is easy to understand how the situation could become disastrous, which it has now. There is a considerable shortage of grain. Mali needs 300,000 tonnes more wheat for 1983-1984. According to UNICEF, 100,000 children will die during the drought, and 200,000, twice that number, will suffer permanent damage as a result of the present famine.

This is an international problem, and Canada has shown some leadership with respect to North-South relations. We recall that in North-South conferences, our Prime Minister took up the cause of the Third World and the help it should receive from industrialized countries. Unfortunately, the results have not been outstanding. I am not blaming our Prime Minister, but industrialized countries have not always responded to appeals by their leaders that the Third World must be helped.

Since there is solidarity among nations at the international level, we must help each other. Considering that the situation is more than disastrous and 100,000 children may die because they will not have enough to eat, is the Government prepared to take the lead once again in the face of this emergency and urge industrialized countries to at least try to help these people who are in truly desperate straits?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the brief answer to Senator Asselin's question is: Yes, the Canadian government has, indeed, taken some concrete action in keeping with what the Prime Minister has said about this very serious problem. This action is not only confined to the area of Africa to which my honourable friend has referred. As a matter of fact, only a few days ago the Canadian government, through the Minister of Agriculture who is currently chairman of a large international food aid organization, made the largest commitment of food aid in Canadian history. This, I think, raised Canada's contribution to international food aid to the level where it is second only to that of the United States. That certainly is a major contribution when measured in terms of Canada's population. However, I realize, also in terms of population, that Canada has a far greater output of many agricultural products than perhaps any other nation in the world, so one of those assertions goes with the other.

On the other hand, I do not accept Senator Asselin's assumption that Canada has not taken concrete action following the promotion by the Prime Minister of a North-South dialogue. Indeed, we have taken very concrete action in terms of hard commitment of tonnage of food plus, in many cases, the dollars for the provision of transportation for that food. Ours is a record that Canadians can view with a great deal of pride. As a people, we are probably making the largest contribution to foreign aid of any nation in the world, at least on a per capita basis.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: A supplementary question, honourable senators. Never did I express reservations about Canada's good faith in showing leadership with respect to Third World countries.

I would like to know whether the Leader of the Government might table in the Senate a list of the aid sent by Canada to those countries in distress.

He has told us that our shipments of wheat products have been increased considerably. That may be so. Considering the current plight in East and West Africa as well as in North and South Africa, the government ought to do a lot more to come to the rescue of whatever is left of those people who are facing such hardships.

I do not question the intentions of the Leader of the Government. I would like the minister to table the list of what the government has done more than other countries in the past year to help those people.

The Leader of the Government should also answer this question: Ever since the North-South dialogue was initiated and as Canada seems to want to show leadership, how much more in terms of Gross National Product percentage has been earmarked for Third World assistance?

I think that Canada cannot brag about a considerable increase in the gross national product percentage set aside for Third World assistance and international aid. It has no reason to brag about its performance in that field, particularly if we keep in mind the standards of the United Nations.

● (1430)

[English]

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I am not sure how much we want to expand into a debate on Canada's participation in aid and relief programs on what started out as an answer concerning Canada's contribution to food supply in those countries in Africa where drought has become and is escalating as a massive problem. We understand that there is that problem, but I have to answer Senator Asselin by saying that Canada has done and is doing a great deal in that area—probably more than any other nation in the world on a per capita basis. Moreover, that effort has been significantly increased recently.

Senator Asselin: That is all very well, but that is not satisfactory to me. It is not enough.

Senator Olson: Well, we are increasing our aid.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We are doing our best.

Senator Olson: We are increasing it. If that is not enough, it would probably never be enough so far as Senator Asselin is concerned, but I have to repeat to him that a great deal more is being done in 1984 and 1985, in keeping with the commitment made by the Minister of Agriculture only a few days ago. Our efforts are at a record-breaking level and there has been a significant increase in them. Furthermore, not only have we committed the tonnage of food; we have also committed the financial resources to transport that food.

Part of our commitment is to international bodies, such as the World Food Program and the FAO and that sort of organization, and some of it is in the form of bilateral aid.

The senator also asked for a list of these things, but I am not sure we have a list of those international and multinational organizations such as the World Food Program.

Senator Asselin: They are listed in CIDA.

Senator Olson: Yes, but the lists of CIDA's activities have already been tabled in this house, so I am not quite sure what he wants in addition to that.

FINANCE

EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate arising from the further weakening of the Canadian dollar in recent days and the need for a considerable intervention on the part of the Bank of Canada to protect the Canadian dollar.

The Senate is aware that a number of unofficial explanations for this further weakening have been given. Indeed, some commentators have attributed this weakness to the rather incautious remarks of the Minister of Finance on the matter.

Has the government supplied the Leader of the Government in the Senate with an official explanation of the causes of this weakening of the Canadian dollar? I am sure we would all like to have the party line on this matter.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think the Minister of Finance gave any recent explanation that was not in line with the government's position or, indeed, with the position of Canada, including the government and a whole lot of other organizations. However, it seems to me that, before we accept the picture Senator Murray tries to paint of the Canadian dollar, it might be well to have the facts in view as well as his opinions.

The facts are that over the past year and a half the Canadian dollar has been very stable against its U.S. counterpart, while outperforming almost all of the other major currencies. Those are the facts. In 1984 the Canadian dollar has traded in a very narrow band centred on approximately $.80 U.S., although some downward pressure emerged early in March. In Canada, the official operations of the foreign exchange market continue to be directed towards maintaining orderly trading transactions and not an attempt by the Bank of Canada, or the Minister of Finance, or others, to interfere with what the market determines. As a matter of fact, Senator Murray mentioned that there has been massive intervention recently. I should advise him that the official international reserves stood at $4.164 billion U.S. at the end of February, which is down only $40 million, or a very small percentage of that total, from the end of 1983.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a supplementary matter with my honourable friend in connection with the government's monetary policy. I agree with him that the Canadian dollar has been remarkably stable over a considerable number of months. That is why I think we are particularly interested in evaluating what is happening at the present time, because it appears that the Canadian dollar has now been dislodged, at least temporarily, from its usual place in the monetary scheme of things with respect to the American dollar. As well, it is under some pressure from European and Japanese currencies.

When this started to happen, the first thing the Minister of Finance did, if I am correctly informed, was to say, "This is a floating currency, so let it float."

Senator Murray: He said, "I'm not going to lose any sleep over it."

Senator Roblin: I do not know whether he corrected himself before he went to sleep, but afterwards, as I understand the matter, he changed his point of view and said that the government would support the Canadian dollar vigorously. That is the sense of what I got from his statement, and my honourable friend can correct me if I have it wrong.

In any case, we have seen the Bank of Canada in the last few days intervening quite massively in an effort to stabilize the Canadian dollar or to prevent its fluctuating too much, which, after all, has been done before. The point I want the minister to comment on is just how far the government's monetary policy goes. I can understand the Bank of Canada's intervention, because that is a normal process, but the strength of his statement in the house the other day led me to wonder whether the policy of the government went so far as to increase the interest rate in Canada, which is generally regarded as one way of supporting the Canadian dollar. In fact, in recent times the Bank of Canada has equated its interest policy with the fate of the Canadian dollar, so that is a fact that we are aware of. Could my honourable friend indicate the government's policy as to how far they are prepared to go in supporting the Canadian dollar? Does it extend not only to the Bank of Canada's operations in the market but also to changes in the rate of interest?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the position of the government, as stated by the Bank of Canada from time to time over the past three or four years, is that they are prepared to let the market decide where the level of the Canadian dollar is to be vis-à-vis any currency and, particularly, the United States dollar. However, there are times when some speculation can be thwarted by the intervention of the Bank of Canada. When they do intervene, which has happened from time to time, they make it very clear that it is only to defend the significant movements that are beyond reason in relation to market demands. I think that continues to be the position of the Canadian government.

However, because my honourable friend brought it up, I should add that, if there is a change in interest rates in Canada vis-à-vis what is offered in the United States—and that has, indeed, happened in the last few days—and if we are to have the free movement of capital between our two countries, as we think is desirable, then we face that undesirable factor of having interest rates move up in this country as well.

We have expressed some concern about that because, quite obviously, that has an effect on the recovery that we hope will continue. If interest rates start to move up again, it will have a depressing effect on the economic recovery that has been going on in Canada and which we hope will continue.

Senator Roblin: I guess my honourable friend did not have the opportunity that I had to listen to the Governor of the Bank of Canada with respect to the policy that he was pursuing in terms of the Canadian dollar. He made it perfectly clear to committees of this Senate that it was not a floating currency, in the way my honourable friend has described it; he made it perfectly clear that his aim was to hold the Canadian dollar steady with the American dollar because he feared the impact on inflation if it went down. On that account he was—"manipulating" is not the right word—openly adjusting the Canadian interest rate to protect the Canadian dollar.

You are caught in a cleft stick: if the dollar does go down and it has a serious inflationary effect, that is no good; on the other hand, if, in order to hold the dollar and save the inflationary aspect, the price of money goes up, that is going to make our—and I hate to use the word "faltering" because I hope it is not faltering—questionable recovery all the more difficult if interest rates go up. Which of those two choices is the government to make?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Olson: I listened very carefully to what Senator Roblin said, and I have a great deal of difficulty in finding any difference between what he described the Governor of the Bank of Canada as saying before a committee—and I was not there at that time—and the explanation I gave a few minutes ago; they are exactly the same. I really cannot explain a difference when I do not see a difference.

Senator Roblin: I will not try to explain the difference to my honourable friend because that would take up more time than the Senate has patience for. However, I would suggest that if he reads his reply to me and the reference to the floating rate of the Canadian dollar, he will see the difference between us.

Senator Olson: I have just been advised that both of us should re-read the answers because some people believe the explanation I gave a few minutes ago as to the intervention, the extent of the intervention and the timing of the interventions by the Bank of Canada, was exactly the same as the explanation Senator Roblin gave a minute or so later.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the drastically high unemployment among the youth of our country, would the Leader of the Government indicate to the chamber if his government is taking note of the idea of Mr. Jim Coutts who proposes a most excellent suggestion which is echoed by many, and that is that 200,000 students could be hired—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is he running for the leadership?

Senator Marshall: —without entailing any extra funds because the moneys would come from the unemployment insurance benefits which are being paid to youths aged 15 to 24? Is the government considering this proposal?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot say that there has been or, indeed, that there will be a direct response to the proposal put forward by Mr. Coutts. I listened to him very carefully as he outlined his proposal at an important meeting in Edmonton two weeks ago. I think there is a great deal of merit in considering not only the objective, with which, certainly, no one disagrees, because, more than that, some of the details of the process he describes are worth serious consideration.

Senator Marshall: I agree with that in view of a letter I received from Mr. Coutts, which states:

Dear Jack:—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): A "Dear John" letter.

Senator Marshall: He says:

Just a note to keep you posted on events in Spadina.

I have enough concerns in Corner Brook, Newfoundland. Along with the letter, he sent me a number of newspaper clippings. His is a suggestion which I brought up in 1970.

Now that he is back with us, would the Leader of the Government impress upon his colleagues that this is a good idea and that it should be looked into very carefully?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): What is going on in Spadina? That is what I want to know.

Senator Marshall: I have not been to Spadina for about 25 years.

Senator Olson: I am sure Senator Marshall is better informed now than he was before he received that letter.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: He is on the priority list.

Senator Olson: Perhaps, if he looks at it with the same keen interest that I did some days ago, he will see that there is a sincere, serious and intelligent attempt to come to grips with what all of us agree is one of the most serious socio-economic problems in this country, that is, the very high levels of unemployment among young people. That is why it is important that we consider these things, but I hope Senator Marshall is not asking that I come back with a detailed response to all of the proposals contained in that idea, because that is not normally the way things are handled. Perhaps a number of the very important initiatives described in this proposal can be incorporated and used in several government programs.

Senator Marshall: I will pass that along to Mr. Coutts because he says:

As always, I would welcome your comments.

Senator Asselin: Is he your man?

Senator Marshall: If you are in touch with him, tell him that I am with a different party; I cannot contribute to his campaign, and I cannot help him in Spadina.

Senator Frith: Think it over.

Senator Olson: You can never really tell what you can do unless you try.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—
(Honourable Senator Robichaud P.C.)

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, last Thursday I moved the adjournment of the debate with the intention of making my contribution to it at the earliest possible convenience. Today is not the earliest possible convenience.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Shame.

Senator Robichaud: It so happens that a week from today, March 20, will be the earliest possible convenience. In the meantime, I will yield to anyone who wishes to make a miniscule contribution to this debate.

Senator Asselin: Disappointing.
Order stands.

THE BUDGET SPEECH

PROPOSALS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 16, 1984:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on 15th February, 1984.

He said: Honourable senators will remember that I called the attention of the Senate to the budget debate, and I want to start what I am sure will be a very positive contribution by the Senate to the proposals contained in the February 15 budget speech of the Minister of Finance.

I should like to underline, and particularly to put in context, an aspect of this budget debate that I think is important and is to be encouraged; that is, the aspect of consultation, which this budget shares with the previous budget. I hope this plan of extensive consultation prior to the presentation of a budget has become a permanent feature of budget-making in Canada. A number of major proposals have benefited considerably as a result of the expertise and knowledge brought to bear through consultation and comment. This budget, as I have said, continues that most desirable direction.

The Minister of Finance and the Honourable Roy MacLaren held consultations with more than 30 groups across Canada prior to the budget. Those groups represented all important facets of Canadian life: labour, women, social agencies, co-operatives, financial institutions, small and large business and many others. Municipal and provincial governments were also consulted. The information and advice received, as they know, made an important contribution. Honourable senators, I say "as they know" in reference to the representatives of those groups because, after the budget was presented, there were indications in the press and elsewhere of the encouragement given by these organizations to the process of consultation.

Building a new budget has been compared to designing and constructing a new road. It is not a monument; it is something to be used. A budget, like a road, is there to serve the needs of the people. A fundamental aspect of the design of a good budget is a clear sense of direction in terms of where we want to go with the economy and the economic welfare of Canadians. People await a budget in order to have some idea of the direction in which the government wishes the country to go.

The new budget is an extension and reinforcement of the sure, strong course of action that is leading this country from recovery to renewed economic expansion. This budget intends to continue that recovery. It can be seen as the third step in a consistent approach to building economic strength. The first step came in the form of the six-and-five program, which was a major national attack on the inflation that was destroying Canada's economy. The second step, the budget of last April, contained a comprehensive program to spur recovery, create jobs and strengthen the productivity and competitiveness of the private sector. Now, with the third step and with an economy improving at a steady pace, the Minister of Finance has presented a budget for the transition from recovery to expansion, including the challenge of ensuring that more and more sectors, regions and individual Canadians share the benefits of recovery and expansion.

This is a budget that carefully matches fiscal responsibility with social responsibility—a budget that follows the strong, moderate course of first containing and then reducing the deficits that are a legacy of the recession while continuing to meet the human needs that are also a legacy of that recession. Above all, it is a budget that builds with consistency and realism on the momentum of the great progress we have made. It is a budget that says “no” to political zigzags in policy; “no” to those who still believe that there are quick fixes or easy shortcuts based on sudden changes of direction. It is a budget that says “yes” to an economic future secured firmly on a foundation of economic strength.

The $4.8 billion special recovery program contained in the April 1983 budget illustrates the continuity and consistency in the budgetary approach of the Minister of Finance. The program was designed and is being carried out as a four-year effort. The special recovery capital projects are making a major, continuing contribution to the recovery, to the expansion and to the long-term capacity of the economy to continue its growth. These projects will have their peak impact this year. The special recovery investment incentives for the private sector will also continue to play a key role in the revival of business investment on which Canadians depend so much.

Honourable senators, to show how far we have come, I will point out some of the improvements in the economy since last year's budget. Canada's economy has grown strongly during the first year of recovery—at one of the fastest rates among the industrial nations. Economic growth continues at a steady pace. Strong expansion for 1984 is forecast to be at about 5 per cent as compared with about 3 per cent last year. Almost 400,000 new jobs were created in Canada last year. Again, that is one of the fastest rates of employment growth in the industrial world. A similar number is forecast for this year, and a total number of more than 1.5 million new jobs is forecast for the period between 1984 and 1988.

Inflation has come down rapidly and, with continued vigilance by Canadians, is expected to remain in the current range of 5 per cent during 1984. No industrial nation has achieved a faster reduction of its inflation rate. Canada is on the move. We have come a long way and there is a lot more to be done. A stronger economy means more benefits for Canadians—for pensioners, young people, home owners and all of those Canadians who are the real beneficiaries of this budget.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Senator Marshall should be applauding.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. William C. Doody: Any encouragement we can give you!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Carry on!

Senator Frith: With that encouraging, thunderous applause—evidence not only of support but of close attention to every word, let us look first at youth.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Watch out for a standing ovation.

Senator Frith: The expansion of the Youth Opportunity Fund has, as a priority, the creation of jobs for youth. The adding of $150 million to the Youth Opportunity Fund will assist young people, including students, to acquire new skills and to find jobs in the private, voluntary and public sectors.

The budget simplifies taxes for small business. It proposes a major simplification of the income tax system for small business, which is an important step and the beginning of a trend that I hope will continue towards tax reform by way of simplification. The most important change proposed is the elimination of the cumulative deduction account. Honourable senators have read the budget and will recognize that the original purpose of the cumulative deduction account was to limit the low tax rate for small business to companies having less than $1 million of cumulative business income.

What will the new proposals do for small business? They will cut small business tax legislation by two-thirds; they will shorten and simplify the tax form—and to that I say, “Hear, hear”—they will reduce the costs of tax compliance and they will increase tax savings for growing small businesses. In the new system's first full year of operation, Canadian-controlled private corporations will find their federal taxes reduced by $150 million.

I come now to the tax assistance that will be provided to farmers. Farmers will now be able to invest up to $120,000 of taxable capital gains from the sale of a farm in an RRSP.

Senator Olson: Senator Bielish would like to applaud for a while.

Senator Frith: I am happy to have Senator Olson acting as a sort of conductor of the symphony, bringing the instruments in at the appropriate time. He is obviously following the score—“score” in the musical sense—because this is something that I thought would evoke some interest from Senator Bielish.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: I don't need any coaching at all.

Senator Frith: These measures, honourable senators, will be introduced to facilitate the transfer of family farms from one generation to another.

Senator Bielish: That has been in place for a long time.

Senator Frith: What I have just referred to has not been in place for a long time. Farm losses are not in any way restricted to those farmers whose principal occupation is farming. Concern has been expressed that changing the loss rules to benefit persons who are part-time or so-called “hobby farmers” could have an adverse impact on farm prices and provide an inappropriate incentive for speculation in farm land. A consultative working group will be established to assess the impact that such changes might have on the agricultural sector before any specific action is taken.

Another important aspect of this budget, and really quite an innovation, has to do not only with the process of consultation before the budget is introduced but also with the suggestion in the budget that measures not be implemented until their impacts have been considered by those who will be affected by them.

● (1500)

Another class of Canadians who benefit from the budget are homeowners. The benefit to homeowners arises from the proposal to increase security of home ownership, thus creating a fairer, more flexible mortgage market. There is the introduction of a mortgage rate protection plan.

Senator Roblin: Which they will pay for.

Senator Frith: The answer to that was placed on the Order Paper. I will be glad to discuss it, and I am sure it will be discussed during the debate on this inquiry.

There are new rules to ensure that borrowers have complete disclosure of all terms and conditions regarding their mortgages, and legislation to give borrowers the right to prepay their mortgages at any time and to establish a prepayment principle that is fair to both borrowers and lenders.

It is proposed that action be taken to create the conditions necessary for the private sector to develop a mortgage-backed securities market. That would assist the reintroduction of mortgages with terms longer than five years.

Pensioners, particularly women, will benefit from the changes announced in the budget. Let me list them: First, there will be improved pensions for Canadians by proposals for pension reform. To ensure that elderly Canadians receive pensions that are sufficient to allow them to live in comfort and dignity, the government will increase the Guaranteed Income Supplement—the GIS—by $50 a month over the next year: $25 per month effective July 1, and another $25 per month effective December 1.

Changes will also be made to ensure that persons receiving partial old age pensions, most of whom are immigrant Canadians, have GIS benefits sufficient to give them the same minimum income as other pensioners.

Changes will be introduced to improve minimum standards for private pension plans, to take effect no later than January 1, 1987. The amendments will provide for inflation protection for future pension earnings; acquired rights to the pension benefits arising from an employer's contribution; portability of acquired benefit rights; survivor benefits for spouses; splitting of pensions between spouses in the case of marriage breakdown; and increased pension coverage for full- and part-time workers. The Canada Pension Plan will also be amended to strengthen it and improve its benefits to women. The changes will provide for mandatory credit splitting on marriage breakdown, continuing survivor benefits on remarriage and pensionable earnings equal to the average industrial wage by January 1, 1987.

Contributors to pension plans will find tax assistance. There will be fair and equivalent access to tax assistance regardless of the type of retirement-saving vehicle used. There will be more generous tax deductions for contributions; the ability to carry forward unused deduction entitlements; an inflation protection for pension deduction and benefit entitlements, and portability of pension benefits.

Who else will benefit? The Canadian auto industry will benefit because of a number of proposed changes to the federal sales tax. Those changes will deal with specific inadequacies of the existing system—again, a clear benefit arising from consultation that took place with the auto industry.

In order to eliminate the unwarranted advantage that the present sales tax system gives foreign cars sold in Canada, the budget proposes to shift the manufacturer's sales tax on motor vehicles to the wholesale level effective March 1, 1984. At present, the tax on a Japanese or European car can be $100 to $200 lower than on a comparable car made in Canada. The proposal will ensure a uniform application of tax for all makes of vehicles.

Hon. Lowell Murray: By how much will the cost increase to the consumer of an imported automobile?

Senator Frith: I do not have that figure. Regarding the public sector, mandatory wage controls will not be extended, and, thus, there will be a resumption of collective bargaining. Moreover, no catch-up will be allowed. The government will bargain according to four principles: Settlements should contribute to reducing inflation and be fiscally responsible; compensation should be comparable to that in the private sector and be based on the total working conditions; compensation should not exceed that in the private sector; and settlements should encourage increased productivity and improved performance and should recognize relative job responsibilities.

Still in the public sector, Parliament will be asked to legislate wage settlements in specific cases, should that be necessary. Also the collective bargaining framework will be reviewed, in consultation with labour—again there is the theme of consultation—in order to modernize it.

Who else benefits? All Canadian taxpayers in general benefit from many of the budget provisions. First, the fairness of tax administration will be improved. The Minister of National Revenue has appointed an independent expert to examine Revenue Canada's operations and to suggest improvements in its services to the public. The budget also proposes a number of immediate measures to relieve the administrative burden on taxpayers and to improve the fairness of the tax system. Individuals and corporations with federal taxes of $1,000 or less will no longer have to pay quarterly tax instalments—something that we all know has become an irritant. In addition, interest will not be assessed on late tax instalments of less than $25. Approximately 350,000 senior citizens and over 50,000 small business and family farm corporations will be exempted from the burden of making instalment payments.

The period within which taxpayers may formally object to tax assessments will be doubled from 90 to 180 days. Interest will be paid on overdue sales tax refunds. Tax paid on sales that become bad debts will be refunded. A full and proper system for assessment, objection and appeal will be introduced into the Excise Tax Act. Again we see the value of consultation, because, as in the auto industry, in pensions, and in all the fields I have referred to, it enables the government, in proposing and designing a budget, to understand the specific areas that need change and reform. That is done by consultation with those who actually live with the results of the budget in their particular area of activity. We can see how specific and carefully targeted the measures can be to remove irritants by means of consultation.

A full and proper system of assessment, objection and appeal will be introduced into the Excise Tax Act. The Tax Court of Canada will be allowed to order Revenue Canada to pay up to $1,000 of the cost of a taxpayer's successful appeal. Despite the fact that over the years a system of costs to the successful party has existed in our courts and in some of our administrative tribunals, a successful taxpayer, appealing his assessment, could not be awarded court costs. The jurisdiction simply did not exist. However, it now exists. Taxpayers will be given the right to provide security rather than pay taxes in dispute, and Revenue Canada will be required to refund any overpayment of income taxes to a Canadian resident resulting from a successful appeal to the Tax Court of Canada or the Federal Court, even if the minister decides to appeal that decision.

There are personal tax changes for all taxpayers. Moving expenses will be deductible to persons who are unemployed and move to a new location to take up employment or start a business. The Income Tax Act will be amended to provide a number of relieving changes to spouses making support payments after a marriage breakdown.

Regarding energy and resource taxes, the incremental oil revenue tax will be deferred for an additional year to June 1, 1985. Taxpayers will also benefit from the government's policy of continued wage and price restraint.

Let me say a word about continued wage and price restraint. I am sure that all honourable senators will rejoice in the knowledge that inflation is down from almost 12 per cent in June 1982 to 4.5 per cent at the end of December, 1983. All honourable senators may not agree in detail as to who should receive the credit—

Senator Murray: What about the 1.5 million unemployed?

Senator Frith: —for the drop in inflation, but we all agree that it is a desirable thing and something to be applauded. This budget indicates the government's commitment to wage and price restraint. The existing policy of limiting increases in the prices that the federal government sets and regulates will be continued for another year. The guideline will be reduced from 5 per cent to 4 per cent for this period.

• (1510)

Another partnership theme of the budget is competitiveness and productivity. Part of this theme is employee profit-participation plans which are made up of three elements. First, co-operation between workers and managers is fundamental to economic growth. The budget proposes tax assistance for new employee profit-participation plans. This is a salutary example of the government's using the budget to show direction and policy decisions in the private sector and the public sector. The plan will also provide a tax credit of 10 per cent of profits shared with 60 per cent of the tax credit going to the individual workers and 40 per cent to the employer. The third element is that tax assistance to employee stock option plans will be broadened to help companies provide employees with incentives to increase productivity.

In order to meet the government's aid commitments and to help Canadian firms take advantage of opportunities in developing countries, the government will establish an aid-trade fund. By 1990 as much as $1.3 billion could be allocated to the fund. It will provide financing for projects in developing countries in which Canadian firms are competitive and for which development assistance financing is required. Other budget provisions, which have already been outlined and which emphasize the government's commitment to a partnership for competitiveness and productivity, are the simplification of taxes for small business, the sales tax changes and the improvements in the fairness of tax administration.

Honourable senators, I will now say something about the economic outlook. The four dimensions to this topic are growth, employment, investment and inflation. On growth, Canada will have achieved 3 per cent real growth in 1983, rather than the 2.3 per cent predicted last April. Employment also grew more rapidly than expected in 1983, by about 400,000 jobs. Real growth is expected to be about 5 per cent in 1984. Over the medium term, it should average almost 4 per cent per year from 1985 to 1988. The government feels that continued, strong, employment growth, of about 3.5 per cent, will increase the total personal income of Canadians in 1984. Employment increases will continue to be strong through the 1980s. More than 1.5 million jobs will be created over the 1984 to 1988 period. At the same time the labour force will grow significantly. For this reason, while the decline in the employment rate in 1984 may not be dramatic, it should fall to about 7.5 per cent in 1988.

Investment is an important element of any economic outlook. Public investment, particularly by the federal government, will give the recovery a strong boost over the coming year. Stable interest rates and rising consumer demands should encourage business to replace and expand its stock of machinery and equipment. Plant construction should also begin to grow again later this year. Total business investment is projected to increase in 1984 and be a major source of economic growth over the medium term. The final element of the economic outlook is inflation. For 1984 as a whole, inflation is expected to average about 5 per cent, compared with 5.8 per cent in 1983. Further reductions are expected through the mid-1980s.

Let me outline briefly the government's fiscal plan. The deficit for fiscal year 1983-84 will be $31.5 billion. Government financial requirements will total about $27 billion. The government remains committed to bringing the federal deficit down in a way that does not damage our economic prospects. The fiscal strategy set out in the April 1983 budget has proved itself to be the right course and will be pursued. The deficit is expected to fall by almost $2 billion to $29.6 billion in the coming fiscal year. The government's financial requirements will be $25.6 billion. In the medium term, the deficit will continue to fall, consistent with the strategy set up last April, from over 8 per cent of gross national product this year to about 4.7 per cent in 1987-88. Financial requirements will fall even faster. They will drop from 6.9 per cent of GNP this year to 3.4 per cent by 1987-88.

Honourable senators, in closing I quote the Minister of Finance:

If Canadians are to meet the challenges of the future, we cannot be satisfied with past performance and past habits. These will not sustain us in a fiercely competitive international marketplace. We must become better than the competition—better at producing and marketing goods and services; better at working together for the shared economic interests of all Canadians.

If we measure up to that challenge, then we shall create new opportunities for Canadians to find good, satisfying, permanent jobs. We shall create opportunities for more Canadians to buy a home, to start or expand a small business, and to invest with confidence in our future. In short, we shall create the opportunities for Canadians to build better, more fulfilling lives on a foundation of economic strength.

That is the goal of the program of action I have presented today to lead Canada from recovery to expansion.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Deputy Leader of Her Majesty's Government in the Senate?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Bell: I enjoyed the honourable senator's resumé tremendously and found it extremely helpful. I was particularly delighted to hear about the plan to simplify income tax forms. I feel that, if we can make more efficient use of the productive ability of Canadians in something other than filling out complicated tax forms, it will be a grand step forward. Would the Deputy Leader confirm the rumour that a very simple tax form is being developed? Apparently it is in three parts. The first is: How much money did you earn last year? The second is: How much money do you have left? And, the third is: Send it!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I assume Senator Bell's question is rhetorical. I hope the government will pay particular attention not simply to the form described by Senator Bell but to the whole thrust of the simplification of tax structure, tax reporting and, thereby, tax forms. I do hope that they will fall short of that final form which she has suggested; however, there is a great deal of good ground in between.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF CLAUSES OF CERTAIN BILLS—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 6, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be authorized to examine the subject-matter of clauses of bills introduced in the Senate or the House of Commons, where such clauses may, by express words or otherwise, infringe upon the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

He said: Honourable senators, as most of you are probably aware, I originally moved this motion on February 9, 1983. At that time I thought that with our new Charter of Rights and Freedoms the subject of human rights would be something that the Senate should take particular interest in. I thought that we should get in early and establish our particular interest in this subject through this motion. Subsequently, I was told that, since the original motion was to provide the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments with the task of looking into this matter and alerting other committees, there would probably be a better chance of passage if that task were given to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. All I was interested in was having some committee perform this function. I was heartily in favour of that suggestion, if it would expedite the matter.

I spoke to Senator Neiman and she was very enthusiastic. She said that she would move a motion to replace mine. She duly gave notice of motion on May 24, 1983, but nothing happened. I tried to withdraw my original motion, but I believe Senator Flynn had some technical objection to that. Both motions remained on the Order Paper and to date, nearly ten months later, Senator Neiman has not even moved her motion.

When Senator Neiman appeared before the Committee on Senate Reform on June 29—one month after having given notice of the motion she never moved—she had this to say:

There are other special roles which I envisage the Senate as being able to play very well indeed. For instance, we have a motion before the Senate at the moment by the chairman of the Regulations and other Statutory Instruments Committee that that committee, which is a joint committee, be empowered to study the subject matter of bills introduced in the Senate or the House of Commons where such clauses could infringe on or give other powers, or where they might make regulations or delegate the power to make regulations. That is, very briefly, the gist of it.

She went on to point out that she had proposed a similar motion, and ended up by stating:

I think both those kinds of powers and activities could be performed very well by either Senate committees or joint committees.

When I moved my original motion I gave a speech which lasted an hour and a half. I gave it in two parts: I commenced on February 9 and spoke for about 45 minutes, as you may remember; and I concluded on February 10. I went into the entire question of human rights and why the Senate should take a particular interest in that subject and explained what had happened in Australia. Honourable senators will be relieved to hear that I do not plan on giving the same type of speech this afternoon.

However, I would like to refer to several of the remarks I made in that speech in order to remind honourable senators. I will be brief. On page 5346 I quoted Senator Missen, who is an Australian senator—

Hon. Martial Asselin: When was this speech made?

Senator Godfrey: On February 9, 1983. As reported at page 5346 of Debates of the Senate, I quoted Senator Missen, the sparkplug in the Australian Senate whose motion resulted in this type of resolution being adopted and the formation of a scrutiny committee. He said:

The Senate Standing Committee on Constitutional and Legal Affairs, in recommending that both the delegation of powers and also other provisions in Bills which conflict with civil liberties and the rights of the citizen ought to be dealt with by a committee of the Parliament, had in mind that what is happening at the moment in, I think, all parliaments and particularly in ours, and that is that the debate in the Parliament is on the major issue of Bills. Questions of improper entry and search and some particular provision which is restrictive or changes an onus of proof are matters which are overlooked in the course of a debate in parliament.

It is all right to say that one achieves the result and that members of Parliament ought to look at these things, but they do not do so.

I also referred to the fact that when Senator Missen proposed his motion in the Australian Senate the Australian government acted no differently from ours. Its reaction is noted on the same page, page 5346:

The Government does not see the need to impose further restrictions on the legislative process. Adequate opportunities are given under existing procedures to ensure protection of personal rights and liberties. The proposal could only serve to frustrate legislative program without compensating benefits.

In spite of the adverse reaction from the Australian government, the Australian Senate went ahead and voted on the motion in a non-partisan way. The senators there broke party rank and approved the motion. I must say that after the provisions of the motion had been operating for approximately a year the government came around and approved it, saying that it had worked very well indeed.

I would now like to refer to a part of my speech, as reported at page 5347. There I quote what Mr. Otto Lang had advised me in a letter. He said in part:

As I observed government in action I came to conclude that in far too many cases simple neglect or too little attention would leave an individual deprived of rights where a legislature really did not intend and would not want to support that result.

Then, as reported at page 5359 I quoted the report of the Australian committee, as follows:

The Committee wishes to make it clear that, by identifying clauses of Bills as raising questions under one or other of its principles, it does not necessarily have a concluded view that the principle in question is in fact infringed. The Committee regards its role as being to alert the Senate, rather than to perform a function similar to that undertaken by the Regulations and Ordinances Committee, of recommending to the Senate that action be taken.

The important word in that passage is "alert"—and I cannot emphasize its use too strongly. However, that message does not seem to have gotten through yet, judging by the reactions expressed in letters I have received, which I will refer to later.

At page 5360 I quoted from a letter I had written to Senator Frith, as follows:

Taking my clue from the stated intentions of the Australian Committee, I have drafted the Motion so that the Joint Committee will not pass judgment upon whether or not there is an infringement, merely it alerts the Senate, and hopefully the Senate and the House of Commons Committee considering the bills, as to a possible infringement by drawing their attention to clauses which may infringe. You will recall that the various reports of the Australian Committee start off with the words "The Committee draws the attention of the Senate to clauses of the following Bills which contain provisions which the Committee considers may fall within the principles expressed in paragraph 1(a)(i) to (iii) of the Resolution of the Senate of 19 November 1981."

I would also like to refer to the fact that the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association struck a committee to look into the functions of second chambers. I went into this in some detail in the long speech I gave, and I will not repeat myself. However, I would like to refer to one part of the association's report, which states:

—there was agreement that in two areas, the early scrutiny of draft Bills, and in the protection of human rights, there is scope for beneficial reform in most countries. Committees of the Upper Chamber are seen as the appropriate instruments for increasing the democratic protection of peoples' liberties.

That is really what this motion is all about and what I have been talking about for nearly ten years in the Senate—so far without any noticeable effect.

• (1530)

On page 5363 of the Debates of the Senate, I referred to the report of the Canadian Bar Association, which had this to say:

The enemies of parliamentary reform are the party leaders—all of them;—

I would go a little further than that, because I think the bureaucrats who are advising and sometimes taking these duties upon themselves are also the enemies of parliamentary reform—and particularly in this case. Senator Perrault, when he was the Leader of the Government in the Senate, told me that the Honourable Jean Chrétien, as Minister of Justice, thought that there was not any necessity for us to take on this job since their officials who looked at the bills would do it. I went with Senator Perrault to see Mr. Chrétien, who expressed surprise and said that he had not heard of the matter. I then spent over an hour with a senior bureaucrat in his department, who had raised the original objection to my motion, and carefully explained that we were not trying to make any decisions; that we were only there to alert the committees dealing with bills so that these matters would not be overlooked.

I also had several discussions with Mr. MacGuigan.

Senator Asselin: And what was his answer?

Senator Godfrey: I have a letter from him which I intend to refer to. I must say that Mr. MacGuigan, at one point in a conversation that I had with him, pointed out that the Department of Justice were intending to take on this job—and of course they should. However, I asked him whether the legislative branch should not also take a look, suggesting that we should not rely solely on the legal experts in his department, and at that time I thought I had his agreement on that matter. Imagine my surprise when I received a letter dated June 21, 1983 from Mr. MacGuigan in which he said:

In connection with the motion as now modified, your recent letter reiterates the significance of developments in Australia concerning the work of their Senate's Standing Committee on Scrutiny of Bills, and suggests that a similar initiative, along the lines of your and Senator Neiman's motions, should be undertaken by the Parliament of Canada. However, I might mention that the Australian and Canadian federal governments and their Parliaments do not operate along identical lines concerning the consideration of basic rights as affected by federal legislation.

That, of course, is the whole point that I am trying to make. Because of government opposition, this house has not yet accepted the principle, whereas they did in Australia so that the two Senates do not operate along identical lines.

Then on the second page of Mr. MacGuigan's letter, he says:

In respect of scrutiny of bills by Parliament, the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments, which I chaired in 1968-69, concluded that the scrutiny of bills should be done entirely by substantive committees and not by one specialist committee such as a Regulations Committee.

My comment on that is that I could not agree with him more, except for the use of the word "entirely". In fact, it should be done by the substantive committee, and that is the proposal that we have been making all along. Again, the regulations committee only alerts the substantive committee in order that these matters will not be overlooked by that committee.

Mr. MacGuigan then continues:

To elaborate on that point in the context of the recent motions by you and Senator Neiman, members of any given subject matter committee knowledgeable about the constitutional implications of policy proposals in bills falling under their committee's scrutiny, could continue to do a more effective job in scrutinizing those bills with an eye to raising questions touching on basic rights than could a single technically specialized committee such as the Constitutional and Legal Affairs Committee.

Again, I entirely agree with what he says. That is why I say that we should only alert these committees so that they can then do a more effective job. However, they cannot do that, if a possible breach of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is not drawn to their attention.

Senator Asselin: That, then, would be a subcommittee of the whole committee?

Senator Godfrey: No. If, for example, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee was considering a bill, we would draw such matters to their attention. In one instance concerning the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, we drew their attention to a problem concerning an enabling clause in four tax treaty bills which they had completely overlooked because it had not been drawn to their attention. Our committee has two lawyers on its staff who can spend the time and effort going through the bills with a fine-tooth comb to see whether or not there are any infringements upon the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; but no senator or member of the House of Commons has time to do that. It is necessary to have staff to perform that function, and our committee has such a staff.

I told Mr. MacGuigan at the time of our discussion that I had requested Senator Neiman to make this motion, and his reply was that perhaps it would be a good idea if Senator Neiman could use the staff of the Regulations and other Statutory Instruments Committee to work for the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee in this area. I readily agreed, and said that we would make the staff available. This was approved by our committee because it was obvious that technical staff was necessary to do this work no matter what committee did it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Who made that suggestion?

Senator Godfrey: Mr. MacGuigan made the suggestion originally to me. I then spoke to Senator Neiman and to the members of the Regulations Committee. I alerted the two lawyers on our staff provided by the Library of Parliament, and everything was agreed upon. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee would then do the work and Senator Neiman, as chairman, would have the aid of these two lawyers who have considerable experience in this area.

The Honourable Mr. MacGuigan, in his letter, then goes on:

Moreover, even if such a function were assigned to the latter committee, members of the subject matter committee generally scrutinizing the bill would probably continue to raise similar questions; this would result in unnecessary and redundant scrutinizing of bills by parliamentary committees.

Again, he seems to have overlooked what had been, I thought, the consensus reached in our discussion. However, appended to this letter in a hand-written note, he says:

John: This letter was prepared for me by the Department. Feel free to discuss the matter further with me, if you wish.

This letter of his, therefore, was the result of some bureaucratic decision, and Mr. MacGuigan signed it. As I pointed out, it seems completely to miss the point that our committee was only to alert the subject-matter committee.

While I can understand that the government leadership in the Senate is under a certain obligation to see that government bills are supported, how we run our affairs in the Senate and how we make what are really minor reforms is our business. I think that is for us to decide and not for the government to decide. It is certainly not for some bureaucrat, who writes a letter for the Minister of Justice, to decide. It is our business to make those decisions, and that is why I am appealing to the Senate on this matter.

There is one other point I would like to make. Now that we have resurrected this motion, I hope we can make our decision quickly one way or the other, and that whoever wishes to speak on it will do so, so that it will not simply be postponed indefinitely.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF CLAUSES OF CERTAIN BILLS—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey, pursuant to notice of March 6, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments be authorized to examine the subject matter of clauses of bills introduced in the Senate or the House of Commons, where such clauses may, by express words or otherwise, bestow powers to make regulations upon a person or a rule-making authority which is couched in unnecessarily wide terms and contains the powers set forth in Paragraph 2 of Part 9 of the cabinet directive on the preparation of legislation approved on 16th April, 1981, the said Part 9 reading in part as follows:

"9. REGULATIONS

In the preparation of proposals for legislation, departments and agencies should observe the following principles respecting regulation-making powers:

(1) When bestowing the power to make regulations upon a person or a rule-making authority, care must be taken to ensure that the statute is not couched in unnecessarily wide terms.

(2) Specifically, certain powers are not to be granted unless the Memorandum to the Cabinet requesting the authority for preparation of the legislation by which such a power would be conferred specifically requests authority for the power and contains reasons justifying the power that is sought. These powers include the following:

- (a) power to make regulations that might substantially affect personal rights and liberties;
- (b) power to make regulations involving important matters of policy or principle;
- (c) power to amend or add to the enabling Act or other Acts by way of regulation;
- (d) power to make regulations excluding the ordinary jurisdiction of the Courts;
- (e) power to make specific regulations having a retrospective effect;
- (f) power to subdelegate regulation-making authority;
- (g) power by regulation to impose a charge on the public revenue or on the public other than fees for services;
- (h) power to fix by regulation, rather than by the statute itself, the penalties for breach of a regulation.";

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house thereof and to invite them to join with this house in the aforementioned action.

He said: Honourable senators, I originally gave notice of this motion on April 20, 1983, and spoke on the matter on April 21, 1983. During the course of my speech, I pointed out that the purpose of this motion is to have the Regulations Committee look at enabling clauses of bills to see whether or not they conform to a cabinet directive and particularly whether they give the power to make regulations that affect human rights. In effect, that directive said that you should not pass an enabling clause from any regulation in too wide terms and that, specifically, there are certain things you should not do, unless a memorandum to the cabinet gives reasons why there should be an exception. The point was that you should give reasons.

● (1540)

The directive, which was originally dated in 1981, was almost identical to a letter from Mr. Turner in 1971. That letter had been approved by cabinet.

When I spoke on this subject on April 21, I said:

What we are really proposing is that the committee look into those enabling clauses and merely alert the appropriate committee considering the bill.

Again, I emphasize that we were only alerting the committee so that they could consider the matter. I said:

If the committee itself does not get around to that in time, there will not be any hold-up of the bill.

In other words, it would not cause any delay, because, if they did not alert the committee, the committee considering the bill would just go ahead.

Further on in the speech, I said:

As you will notice, the directive says that certain powers are not to be granted unless the memorandum to the cabinet requesting the authority for preparation of the legislation by which such a power would be conferred specifically request authority for the power and contains reasons justifying the power that is sought. It is my submission that any committee of Parliament, either of the Senate or of the House of Commons, is entitled to the same explanation.

Senator Frith spoke on April 26, and I would like to refer to his speech. He said:

In effect, what the proposer is saying is that cabinet, by reason of a memo and a decision, has directed that all legislation meet certain tests with reference to enabling clauses.

That is not what I said. It is not what the directive said. All it said was that, if it does not meet these tests, then there must be an explanation and reasons given—and there can be very valid reasons why it should not meet the test, but you have to give the reasons which the cabinet will look at.

Then he went on to say:

Therefore, Senator Godfrey's reasoning goes that a joint committee of Parliament should do the job of making sure that the cabinet does what it has told itself it ought to do.

All I can say is: No, no, no, that is not what I said at all. What I said was that, if they do certain things and the cabinet are given reasons—and they can be very valid ones—then the legislators are entitled to be given the same reasons so that the parliamentary committee can consider them. They may be perfectly valid. I am not saying anything more than that.

Then Senator Frith went on to say:

I believe that what it is now asking the Senate to give it the power to do is something that all members of Parliament and all honourable senators will want to do, and I see no reason why this particular committee should be given that responsibility.

Well, I say it again: No, we are not asking for that responsibility. We are only saying we are going to alert the other committees. They take the responsibility. We are not asking for any power, except to make sure that these matters are not overlooked and that the reasons given to cabinet for making exceptions are given to the Senate or House of Commons committees.

Then he went on to say:

Also, if I am correctly informed, the Minister of Justice has publicly taken the position that he supports a reform of the type proposed in this particular motion. But he prefers that a whole scheme be brought forward relating to reform of legislation—both the primary enabling clauses and subordinate legislation and the relationship between them—which may or may not include this particular motion but will certainly include some of the questions raised by it. So it is not a question of whether something should be done but of who should do it and how.

Now, that is nearly ten months ago. So far as I am concerned, they have had all the time in the world. Are we going to sit around here in the Senate for years and never do anything, just because the government is "considering"? Isn't it up to us?

I draw the attention of the members to the fact that when a House of Commons committee was considering the reform of the procedures and rules of the Commons, not one cabinet minister was on the committee and the committee never asked even a single cabinet minister to testify before it. That committee knew who the enemy of reform was, as did the Canadian Bar Association. It did that deliberately, making the decision on its own. Of course, in the end, if it had not been for the co-operation of the government, the reform proposed probably would not have been accepted, but it was completely without advice from cabinet ministers—and I suggest that the Senate should operate in the same way.

Senator Frith also made the following statement:

The merit of this motion is that it raises a very fundamental question, among others, of, for example, whether draft regulations should be presented simultaneously with draft bills before Parliament.

With all due respect to Senator Frith, this motion raises no such question. It is kept within narrow limits. That question is entirely another matter, which is legitimate to discuss, but not in the context of this resolution.

Senator Roblin also spoke on this motion. This is part of what he had to say:

After hearing the words of the House Leader with respect to this motion, I realize that it is unlikely that it will be approved by this House.

Well, I don't think you should give in quite so easily, Senator Roblin. I don't think, either, that the Conservative members should give in so easily.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You have to convince your own colleagues first.

Senator Godfrey: Yes, I am doing that, but I want to get Senator Roblin on my side, too. I was hoping I would have more success with him and his leader.

Senator Roblin gave a very interesting speech about the disallowance of regulations in Australia, but it had nothing to do with my resolution.

All I am saying to my fellow members in the Senate is this: Let's take matters into our own hands and decide how we want to improve our procedures; then do it and not pay any attention to what some senior bureaucrat in the government might think.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Bravo.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this has been a day for thunderous applause. Although I don't expect my motion to attract the same applause, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FINANCE

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO COMPLETE
EXAMINATION COMMENCED IN PRECEDING SESSION

Hon. C. William Doody, pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 8, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to complete its examination of the role of the Federal Government in generating economic development through technological change, begun under its examination of the Main Estimates 1982-83, tabled in the Senate on 23rd February, 1982;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, in effect, the purpose of this motion is to allow us to complete a series of hearings we began last year which comprise a relatively short study. That study is almost finished. We have but one or two hearings left to complete the study, and I am now, through this more or less housekeeping motion, simply asking the permission of the Senate to do that.

My understanding has always been that the Senate finance committee has operated under the umbrella of the estimates, taking its authority to do what it wished to do from that particular reference. However, I think it is preferable that, when a special study is undertaken, the permission of the Senate be requested, and that is the basis for this motion, which I move, seconded by Senator Marshall.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think we should support this motion.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Acting Leader of the Opposition): That is the best speech I have heard in some time.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, March 15, 1984, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Bill read first time.

Senator Molgat moved, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTH TO ELEVENTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's seventh to eleventh reports approving budgets of the following committees:

Energy and Natural Resources; and Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry.

(For text of reports see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN ESTIMATES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, March 22, 1984, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the expenditures pertaining to veterans affairs set out in the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985.

BORROWING AUTHORITY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-21

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-21, intituled: "An Act to provide borrowing authority", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we would like to hear the deputy leader tell us why we should grant leave.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in a discussion with the chairman of the committee, and, in fact, in a note he sent to members of his committee, he pointed out that this was likely to be something that the committee would want to study as a part of its work. In the past we have referred the borrowing authority bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for subject-matter study.

That brings me to why I think leave should be granted today. I checked and found out that there is likely to be a vote taken on the bill later next week in the House of Commons. If leave were granted today, that would at least give us a head start of a day or two, giving the committee a chance to plan, over the weekend, some hearings and to arrange for the appearance of the minister and other witnesses next week. That is why leave should be granted.

Senator Roblin: Is it intended that the committee meet before we sit on Tuesday of next week?

Senator Frith: I will refer that question to the chairman of the committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): When does the government need the bill? Why have a pre-study?

Senator Frith: Need, of course, is a big subject.

Senator Flynn: I said "when"?

Senator Frith: I expect that the government will need the bill by the end of March. Normally it asks for the passage of the borrowing authority bill prior to the end of the fiscal year.

For that reason, I understand that there is an arrangement in the other place for a vote to take place next week. That is why I have asked for authority for our committee to study the bill as early as possible next week.

Senator Roblin: If the committee is not going to meet before the Senate sits next Tuesday, and while I do not oppose the substance of the motion, I do not see any reason to give leave. We can deal with the matter next Tuesday.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will not urge the matter beyond the point of meeting the convenience of the committee. With the idea of a pre-study next week, my intention was to help the committee get a head start in its planning. If the chairman of the committee tells me that that particular boost is not necessary, then I am happy to leave the matter for consideration, as a motion, until Tuesday.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I can only say that this committee is completely at the disposal of the Senate. There is no immediate urgency with respect to this particular bill. We will meet whenever it is presented to us. I see no need to have leave granted today. We can deal with it on Tuesday, Wednesday, or whenever, at the pleasure of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I mention, as well, that because it is apparent that it will be treated as a motion, it will be dealt with at the end of the day on Tuesday. Therefore, if the committee does want to make any such plans and if it seems that the motion will be passed then, we could always ask for leave to bring motions forward.

Senator Roblin: I point out to my honourable friend that the committee could not meet while the Senate is sitting unless some special arrangement were made.

Senator Frith: If leave is not granted, then there is nothing we can do about that anyway.

Senator Flynn: Let us say that we are going to give priority to this motion next Tuesday, which is the day to which I understand the deputy leader proposes to adjourn the Senate.

Senator Frith: That is correct.

Senator Flynn: Leave is not granted.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 20, 1984, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It arises from the announcement a few moments ago that the bank rate has been increased to 10.56 per cent from 10.20 per cent. I note that this is the highest rate since that of December 1982, at which time the prime rate of the chartered banks was 13 per cent. My question is: In the view of the government, is the condition of the Canadian economy such as to benefit from an increase in the central bank rate, with the probable consequent increase in the chartered bank rate, mortgage interest rates, and consumer loan interest rates?

● (1410)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it would be somewhat easier for the government of any country, including Canada, if the relationship were as simple as that. Obviously the improvement in the economy can move along better if interest rates stay down, because obviously all of the other ramifications would be easier to handle. Unfortunately, there are factors on the other side of the coin, one of them being that so long as we have a free movement of capital in and out of Canada, there will be a reaction to interest rate movements on this side of the border and in other countries, particularly in the United States. It is not an opinion but a fact that interest rates have recently been strengthened in the United States, somewhat more than in Canada, which has caused some divergence of capital flows that has weakened the Canadian dollar by a certain percentage. It is also a fact that—it is difficult for me to have to listen to two conversations going on at the same time.

An Hon. Senator: In both languages, and on a different subject.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is because you have nothing to say.

Senator Olson: I have many things to say. We can go through the song and dance that we went through approximately a year and a half ago in attempting to blame the government, or the Minister of Finance, or someone, each time there is a movement one way or the other. Every time the value of the dollar moves one way or the other, it has a beneficial effect on some people and a detrimental effect on others. The point on which I wish to conclude is that there is an inflationary cost, and a cost of living, and so on, that is also related to the value of the dollar. Therefore, a balance has to be struck as to how much intervention there should be from time to time, while at the same time adhering to the policy that has been clearly stated. The Governor of the Bank of Canada, according to Senator Roblin, and also the Minister of Finance, had a good explanation of the role that will be attempted to be played with regard to intervention.

Senator Murray: When the Leader of the Government speaks of the free movement of capital he is, of course, talking about the recent weakening of the Canadian dollar. Is the government faced with two choices: first, allowing the Canadian dollar to fall further, with its consequent effect on the cost of imports and therefore on the rate of inflation, or, second, increasing interest rates, with the consequent effect of stifling investment and economic growth, and has the government opted for the second choice, namely, that of increasing interest rates and stifling further economic growth and investment?

Senator Olson: No. That is neither a reasonable nor a fair way of putting the question—although I understand completely my honourable friend's reason for doing so. He can be assured that the Government of Canada and the Bank of Canada will set and continue to follow a balance that is in the interests of the country with respect to both sides of that question.

Hon. C. William Doody: Very comforting.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Does the Leader of the Government still advocate, as he did some 20 years ago, offering interest-free loans to municipalities?

An Hon. Senator: Sacred.

Senator Olson: I made many intelligent comments with respect to that subject, but I think it is somewhat unreasonable for the Leader of the Opposition to expect me to dredge up all those good ideas of 20 years ago and determine what I need to do now to make good on them.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Perhaps it is in a file they have on you.

THE SENATE

VISIT TO PARLIAMENT OF SPEED-SKATING CHAMPION GAÉTAN BOUCHER

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would have liked to direct my question to the Liberal Whip, but in his absence, I shall direct it either to the Leader or to the Acting Leader of the Government.

Yesterday, in Ottawa, we greeted a great Canadian athlete by the name of Gaétan Boucher, who was officially welcomed in the cities of Hull and Ottawa; he was invited to lunch with the Prime Minister and was applauded in the House of Commons.

I would like to know why he was not invited to the Upper Chamber, the Senate, for the Minister should know that there still are senators who are interested in amateur sports and they would have liked to salute Gaétan Boucher and congratulate him on his performance at the Olympic games.

Are our relations with the other place so bad that we could not make the necessary arrangements for this athlete to come to the Senate, and that everything was left with the House of Commons? Why was he not invited to the Senate?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that all Canadians in every part of the country, including all senators—

Senator Asselin: Answer my question.

Senator Olson: —are extremely proud of the accomplishments of Gaétan Boucher.

Senator Asselin: That has been said.

Senator Olson: Yes, it has been said over and over again so that even Senator Asselin understands it.

Senator Asselin: Answer my question.

Senator Olson: I do not know specifically why Gaétan Boucher was unable to be present in the Senate chamber for a few minutes. I do know that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport was involved in some of the arrangements for Mr. Boucher's visit to Ottawa and that his entire day was taken up. I talked to the minister this morning about it—

Senator Asselin: To whom?

Senator Olson: To the Honourable Jacques Olivier.

Senator Asselin: The new minister?

Senator Olson: Yes. He was involved in many of the activities for Mr. Boucher and they went on all morning, all afternoon and all evening until very late. Mr. Boucher was exhausted by the time it was all over.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: You mean the minister was.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I understand that it is not easy for the Leader of the Government to tell us that he has failed in his duty as Leader of the Government in the Senate to arrange for a visit by Gaétan Boucher to the Upper House.

It still remains that, once again, the Leader of the Government has missed an excellent opportunity to draw the Canadian Senate into the limelight.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary. Since Mr. Gaétan Boucher, after attending the Question Period at the House of Commons, said that he had just seen some excellent figure skating, would it not have been a good thing for him to see that there are even better skaters in the Senate, especially the Leader of the Government?

[English]

Senator Olson: All I can do is assume that Senator Asselin and I should thank the Honourable Leader of the Opposition for the compliment.

Senator Asselin: Is that complimentary to you?

Senator Olson: And to you.

Senator Asselin: So you take it as a compliment?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—EFFECT OF INCREASE ON WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question of privilege with regard to a delayed answer. On February 21—

Hon. Eric Cook: Of which year?

Senator Marshall: —of this year I asked the acting leader a question about the recent increase in the GIS of $50 and its application to veterans. That was three weeks ago, but I have not yet received an answer.

I should like to read the question in order to support my case, because a similar question was asked in the House of Commons yesterday and at that time the Minister of Veterans Affairs gave the answer I was seeking. In fact, the answer was very obvious.

● (1420)

My question was:

Honourable senators, my question has to do with the recent increase of $50 in the GIS. What effect will it have on veterans receiving the War Veterans Allowance after they reach the age of 65? For those who qualify, will this increase in the GIS be deducted from the War Veterans Allowance or will they get the full advantage of it?

I asked that question because there was an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act which would have made the increase in the GIS applicable to war veterans by raising the ceiling of the maximum allowed to veterans. The Acting Leader of the Government responded:

Honourable senators, the Department of Veterans Affairs comes under the administration of Senator Austin so, on his behalf, I will undertake to try to get an answer.

Yesterday, in the House of Commons the Honourable Allan B. McKinnon asked the following question:

Will the Minister assure the House that the budget announcement of an increase of $50 per month for single GIS recipients will be reflected in a $50 per month increase for war veterans allowance recipients?

That question is phrased differently, but it is the same question. The Minister of Veterans Affairs responded to that question. As I say, it is three weeks since I asked my question. This type of situation has occurred a number of times in the Senate and it is not good enough. The question was simple; the answer was obvious, but I wanted it confirmed on paper so that when I am asked that question I can quote what the minister said.

I find it very hard to understand why I could not have had that answer sooner. If I understand the process correctly, the question goes to a clerk or an assistant in the leader's office; he contacts the department responsible and the answer is supposed to be forthcoming.

In this particular case two ministers were looking into the matter. I can understand why that question was directed to Senator Austin, because it comes under his responsibility as Minister of State for Social Development.

Obviously, there is something wrong with our system. We have just been discussing Senate reform, and this is the type of reform that should be dealt with. We are trying to represent our regions by bringing up these questions, but somebody is not doing his job. If it is the fault of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, we should have the guts to ask him what the hell he thinks he is doing. What is our status in this chamber? The way this matter has been treated shows a lack of courtesy and, frankly, I think it is ridiculous. I deserve an answer and the minister should be made to account for it, and I will do it one way or another.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the procedure followed for obtaining answers to questions asked here is exactly as described by Senator Marshall. The Minister of Veterans Affairs is in the House of Commons and when a question is asked of him there, of course, I do not think it would be courteous of us to tell him that he should not answer the question there until he deals with the answer here. All we can do is take the question as notice, send it to the department responsible and ask the department and the minister to give us the answer.

When you say that is not good enough, I do not know what would be good enough. The Leader of the Government, his colleagues in cabinet and I are not pleased that it takes time to get these answers. The fact is that most ministers of the Crown are in the House of Commons and we have to go through these channels in order to get the answers from these ministers who are directly responsible to the House of Commons and, of course, responsible to us in the way that I described.

Naturally, we will again draw to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs the comments made by Senator Marshall, but if there is a suggestion, if there is a better system we can put into effect to get the information requested, we are open to such suggestions. There is no point in my saying that we can do anything more than that. All we can do is point out to the ministers that the information is not coming to us quickly enough for the satisfaction of honourable senators.

Senator Marshall: Whoever received the message in the Department of Veterans Affairs knew the answer. The minister knew the answer. I can imagine someone saying, "Oh, it's only the Senate; let's not worry about them for a while, until we have nothing better to do." Everyone in the department knew the answer. I am not so concerned with the fact that we did not get the answer; to me, it is a matter of principle. The whole process is one of apathy and complacency. We must keep after them and say, "Look, we want the bloody answers."

Senator Frith: That is what I just said, in different terms.

Senator Marshall: I brought this up last year and the year before, and nothing has ever happened.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we do it, and I believe there has been an improvement in terms of time. Even Senator Cook thought that Senator Marshall must be talking about a year ago instead of only three weeks ago. Some honourable senators may think there has not been an improvement, so perhaps we could do a little study to see if there has been an improvement in the time taken to provide answers.

Nevertheless, it is a fact of life and part of the system that ministers in the House of Commons—and it is not confined to ministers of this government—feel themselves more pressed by questions from the House of Commons than they do by those from the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Even the same question.

Senator Frith: Perhaps exactly what Senator Marshall has described did happen.

Every time a question is asked, both Senator Olson and I ask our executive assistants to seek the answer. I am confident that any lack of efficiency and speed in getting the answers cannot be laid at the door of anyone responding here in the Senate. We will keep up the pressure; you keep up the pressure: I am on your side; that is what we all have to do.

Senator Marshall: I was almost sure of the answer when I checked it out by talking to the regional director of Veterans Affairs in Newfoundland the day after the budget came out. As I said before, I cannot give out any information on his say-so, or on how I interpret the act; I want the minister to give us the answer. He gave a very simple answer last night. As far as I am concerned, it is a matter of complacency.

Do any of the ministers in this chamber ever bring this matter up in cabinet? We are just as important as members of the House of Commons and have some status in Parliament.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Yes, we do.

Senator Marshall: Surely, as a matter of protocol, we deserve some priority.

I hope the leader and deputy leader will emphasize the fact that it is discouraging to ask questions. I just say, "What the hell good is it asking questions?" That is why I do not ask as many questions now.

Senator Frith: We might do a study of that too.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

MAIL DELIVERY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would ask the minister responsible: What is going on in the Post Office?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Gigantès: On March 8, 1984, I sent a note to Mr. Charles Lussier, Clerk of the Senate, from 140 Wellington Street. Unfortunately, it went by the Post Office. He received that letter today. I realize we have glaciers in Canada, but in Ottawa?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: When did you send it?

Senator Gigantès: I sent it on March 8, and he received it on March 15; it took seven days to cross the street.

Hon. C. William Doody: That's progress!

• (1430)

Senator Gigantès: I have before me a letter sent to me by the Greek community in Toronto dated January 30, 1984. I received it on March 15, 1984. Both of these letters are written in one of the two official languages. Had that not been so, I would have said that the RCMP might have been trying to read my mail—although I do not suppose for a moment they were trying to do so, since I am not interesting enough—and that the delay might have arisen because of translation problems, but these letters are in French and English. What is the Post Office up to? Why is it taking so long for mail to cross Wellington Street?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall refer the question and the supporting information to the minister responsible.

ENGAGEMENT IN COMMERCIAL UNDERTAKING

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ask the same minister, at the same time, if he could enlighten us as to why the Post Office is moving into the commercial area. I might say that the local businessmen are very concerned about this.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall also take that question as notice.

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS LIMITED—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill S-10, to amend the act of incorporation of United Grain Growers Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, the reason for requesting leave to proceed with this bill today is that next week I have to be with the Special Committee on National Defence on a trip outside of Ottawa. Also, the company is anxious to have its officials meet, at the earliest possible date, with the committee to which I intend to move referral of this bill. Therefore, this request was made as a convenience to the company to allow it more notice than it would otherwise have had. A board of directors meeting is coming up in early April, and it would be helpful were it possible to have this matter concluded by that time.

Before going into the details of the bill itself, perhaps I should give honourable senators some background on this most important company, in Canadian terms, and particularly in western Canadian terms. United Grain Growers is one of the major grain handlers in this country. Of the four companies owned by producers, it is the only one that operates in all of the prairie provinces. The other three, the pools, operate normally only within the province for which they are licensed. United Grain Growers operates in all three prairie provinces and even has a small operation in British Columbia, so it is one of the major grain handlers in the west.

To give you some idea of its importance to the prairie provinces in particular, in the past year, for example, United Grain Growers operated country elevators at 72 points in Manitoba, 136 points in Saskatchewan, 138 points in Alberta and three points in British Columbia. They have three major terminal elevators, two in Thunder Bay and one in Vancouver. They employ just over 2,000 people in total. Their sales and revenue in 1983 were almost $1.2 billion, leaving them with a net revenue, prior to income tax and patrons' dividends, of something in the order of $21 million. As honourable senators can see, this is a major enterprise.

United Grain Growers has approximately 94,000 members. The total number of permit books issued by the Canadian Wheat Board in western Canada is approximately 145,000. Although all of those members are not necessarily permit holders, one gets an idea of the proportion and the importance of this company within the whole system.

United Grain Growers Limited is totally owned and controlled by farmers. The membership shares can only be held by farmers and can only be transferred to other farmers. The membership has one vote per member, not based on shares, so that it is a totally farmer-owned and farmer-controlled operation.

The company has a long history—78 years. It began in 1902 and was incorporated in 1906 as a Manitoba company under the name Grain Growers Company Limited. It became a federally incorporated company in 1911, when it obtained its first charter from Parliament.

The Senate has, in a sense, a particular connection with this grand old company, because Senator Crerar, who is well-remembered by many of the senators here, was its president for many years—indeed, from 1907 until 1929. Thus, the Senate has that connection with this firm.

Over the years the Senate has also passed a number of bills amending the charter of the company with respect to its capital stock. Basically, that is what this bill proposes.

The explanatory notes, like the petition, which I read yesterday, are clear in setting out the intent of the bill. The request is for an increase in the capital structure from the present $25 million to $45 million. This is to be accomplished by an additional 1,000,000 class "A" shares at $20 per share.

The need for an increase in capital structure is to enable the company to retain earnings. At present the company uses these class "A" shares to pay out patronage dividends, and by doing that it is able to retain its earnings, which it needs at this point, in any case, to increase its facilities as grain handling requirements increase.

There is also provision for an increase in the amount of interest that can be paid on these class "A" shares, with the understanding as well that the same interest must be paid on the class "B" shares.

[Senator Molgat.]

A request is included to increase the limitations on the ownership of class "A" shares. At present only 5,000 can be owned by any one individual. That will be increased to 15,000 shares per individual.

Basically, those are the provisions of the bill. They are reasonable in light of the demands upon the company and in considering its past record, which has been excellent. I recommend the bill to the Senate.

It is my intention to seek referral of the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I recognize that as a private bill it would normally go to another committee, but in light of past practice I would prefer to send it to the committee that dealt with the previous capital restructuring of this company. In 1976, when a similar bill was presented to increase the capital structure, it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce because of the nature of the subject matter. Therefore, it is my intention to move that the bill be referred to that committee, assuming it receives second reading.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in speaking to second reading of this bill, I might say that, when my colleagues and I learned of the situation of the Honourable Senator Molgat with respect to the timing of his introduction, we were happy to join with him in recommending to the house that the matter be dealt with this afternoon. I hope that it may even be disposed of this afternoon and referred to the committee, as he suggests. The study of the bill in committee will give us an opportunity to hear from the company and to satisfy ourselves that the measures they propose carry the support, as I am told they do, of the membership of their organization.

I am happy my friend took the time to say a word about the United Grain Growers because there are not many large organizations of such a nature now headquartered in the city of Winnipeg to which we can refer. It is a matter of no small satisfaction to me, as the senator from Red River, which runs through the city of Winnipeg, to be able to reflect on the contribution that the United Grain Growers and their people have made to our community and to the whole of the farming community in the west.

It was interesting to hear the reference to Senator Crerar as president of this organization. I think I have known every president from Senator Crerar right down to the present time in the United Grain Growers organization, and many of their leading people as well. I have always been struck by what, to me, was the sane and constructive—one might also say conservative—leadership they gave to farmers in western Canada in respect of problems in the grain trade and, indeed, other aspects of agriculture as well. This has been a leading organization in the agricultural life of western Canada. In my opinion, it is an organization which has a first class record of solid and progressive leadership in the field in which it plays such an important role. I, for one, would be willing to support any move in this house to promote its activities in such a way as to assist it in developing its services even further.

The details of the bill seem to me to be quite straightforward. It is probably the type of situation which in the case of other companies could be dealt with under the Canada Business Corporations Act but, in view of its special charter, it has to be dealt with by means of legislative enactment of Parliament.

It is a great institution; it is one of the pillars of my community. I am pleased that we can help to organize its finances in such a way as to enable it to continue its leadership in Manitoba and in western Canada.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has mentioned something which is of some concern to me. I understand that, having been incorporated by a special act of Parliament, the capital structure cannot be changed otherwise than by this bill at this time. However, I would like to ask Senator Molgat if he could inquire whether or not it is necessary to continue with that system; whether or not it would be possible to adopt a procedure similar to that adopted in the case of Bell Canada and other corporations, whereby in the future they could obtain changes in capital structure or letters patent through the usual method provided in company law.

Senator Molgat: I do not know the answer to the question. I will be pleased to find out if there are other means of doing this.

Senator Flynn: This could be provided for in the future, in this bill.

Senator Molgat: In this bill?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Molgat: We shall check into that matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Molgat moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH SERVICES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-3—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 13, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-3, intituled: "An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, I presented that notice of motion last Tuesday. I wanted to give the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology the opportunity to study the subject matter of Bill C-3.

When I requested that permission, I think it was Senator Roblin who suggested that since I could not provide any urgent reason for not proceeding with formal notice as usual, that motion could give the honourable senators the opportunity to examine the matter.

Now I ask the honourable senators to support the motion.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of March 13, 1984, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be deemed to have been authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel for any studies it undertook with respect to Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to make related amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971".

He said: Honourable senators, when I gave notice of this motion I explained that it was merely to correct a technical error. When the reference was made we forgot to put in that term with respect to the hiring of technical personnel and so on.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 20, 1984, at 2 p.m.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the calendar year 1983, pursuant to section 34(2) of the Official Languages Act, Chapter O-2, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, March 22, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, according to recent tradition, if tradition can be recent—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The word "custom" would be more appropriate.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Senator Flynn.

Two weeks ago the question was raised whether the arrangement for committees to sit on Wednesday afternoon is worthwhile. Last week, I said I intended to review the system with committee chairmen at a meeting this Thursday.

Meanwhile, I see that two committees will be sitting tomorrow, that is Wednesday, one being the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, while the other one is the Committee on National Defence, which will be sitting outside Ottawa.

In any case, at the meeting with committee chairmen I intend to suggest that we continue our custom, to use the expression preferred by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I must say this explanation is not very convincing. I wanted to know which committees would be sitting tomorrow, and Senator Frith says, obviously, that the Committee on National Defence will be away for the whole week and will therefore not be sitting here tomorrow nor any day this week. Thus that would not be a reason for not sitting Wednesday afternoon.

As for the other committee, I have not yet been notified, but I understand that it is only a possibility, provided we adopt the proposal on the Order Paper to refer the subject matter of Bill C-3 to this committee.

I am therefore inclined to say that the explanations of the Deputy Leader of the Government are rather superficial, but given the assurance that this recent custom will be reviewed very shortly, we agree to adopt the motion.

Senator Frith: May I take this opportunity to emphasize that the main reason is that we shall be reviewing the question?

As far as the committees sitting tomorrow are concerned, my comments were in parentheses, as it were.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH SERVICES

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL
C-3—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-3, intitled: "An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto:

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—
(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this motion stands in the name of Senator Macdonald. When speaking to him following the adjournment of the Senate last Thursday, he said that Senator Roblin had asked that the debate on the motion be adjourned. Since then I have had discussions concerning questions on the motion raised by Senator Flynn and Senator Roblin. I see that the chairman of the committee has now taken his seat, and I would therefore ask that this order stand until later this day in order that I might have an opportunity to speak to him about it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

THE BUDGET SPEECH

PROPOSALS BY MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on 15th February, 1984.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, once again the government, through its deputy leader in the Senate, has provided this inquiry, enabling honourable senators to address themselves, in an organized and more formal way, to the government's budgetary policy. I again express my appreciation to the government for having taken the initiative in providing us with this opportunity.

I listened, as always, with respectful attention to the Deputy Leader of the Government when he opened the debate. Unfortunately for him, some of his rhetoric—particularly the rosy assessment of the country's economic prospects at the moment—is being overtaken by events almost daily.

The Deputy Leader of the Government, as we all know, has a highly engaging turn of phrase.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Here comes trouble!

Senator Murray: I was particularly interested in his ascent into analogy, when he drew the analogy of budget-making and road-building. I thought that the analogy had a familiar ring to it. Sure enough, after some research, I discovered that it was the great phrase-maker himself, Pierre Trudeau, who drew the analogy many years ago in 1969. It was at a time when federal government spending was $13.8 billion annually. In drawing this analogy to road-building, Mr. Trudeau said:

We'd be on the road to financial disaster if nothing was done to bring spending under control.

Well, the great phrase-maker, the great road-builder has taken us well down that road and we have arrived, I suggest, at the destination he pointed out for us in 1969: the road to financial disaster for the Government of Canada.

• (1410)

Hon. Peter Bosa: It is under control.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Ask Senator Perrault.

Senator Murray: It also occurred to me in listening to the Deputy Leader of the Government that this is the fifth budget that has been brought in by this government since its return to office in February 1980. There have been five budgets and two mini-budgets. The budgets were on October 28, 1980; November 12, 1981; June 28, 1982; April 19, 1983 and February 15, 1984. The financial statements or mini-budgets were brought in on April 21, 1980 and October 27, 1982.

This government is in the fifth year of its mandate. I think it is only fair and appropriate to review the budgetary policy of the government and to examine the results that those budgetary policies have had on the economy of our country. As I say, the government was returned to office in February 1980 and sworn in in early March. Mr. Allan MacEachen made his parliamentary debut as Minister of Finance on April 21, 1980. He did not introduce a budget but a financial statement or mini-budget, the purpose of which was to outline what measures in the previous Conservative government's budget of December would be retained and proceeded with. Their proudest boast—and one can still hear the backbenches ringing with applause—was that they would not proceed with the “heinous”, “iniquitous” 18-cent excise tax increase on gasoline. Of course, Mr. MacEachen did not say that gasoline prices would rise in 1980 by about 22 cents per gallon, depending on the location; he did not say that between 1980 and 1984 gasoline prices would rise by $1.13 per gallon and that the price of home heating fuel would rise by $.80 per gallon.

While pretending on April 21, 1980 to honour the Liberal Party's commitment to prevent energy price increases and to do away with the energy price increases forecast by the Conservative government, Mr. MacEachen took away the energy tax credits in the Conservative budget, energy tax credits that would have provided $220 per year for a typical low or middle income family this year. Thus began the erosion of this government's credibility with the taxpayers and the people of Canada. The statement of Mr. MacEachen did retain several of the measures intended to help small business that were in the Conservative budget. There was the small business development bond and the deductibility of salaries of spouses by unincorporated businesses. But in 1980 Mr. MacEachen's first financial statement did away with several important initiatives that had been introduced in the Conservative budget. Out went the additional depletion allowances for oil and gas exploration. Out went the tax incentives for regional development and fishermen. Out went the Canadian common stock investment plan, a positive program which would have encouraged Canadians to invest in the growth of Canadian companies.

The government's decision to kill these initiatives of its predecessor seems to me now much more significant than it did then. That decision provided a foretaste of the government's anti-business, anti-investment, anti-incentive attitude which was to gain such notoriety for the government and, unfortunately, for Canada in the next two budgets that Mr. MacEachen brought down. It provided a hint of the government's conviction that Canadian economic growth can best be assured through the aggrandisement of the government sector at the expense of the private sector.

Six months later, on October 28, 1980, Mr. MacEachen rose to give his first formal budget address. Again, there was no attempt to outline a fiscal and economic policy for the government; instead, Mr. MacEachen's budget address in October of 1980 provided a vehicle for the introduction of the National Energy Program. This is not the time to enter into an examination of the devastation which the National Energy Program has wreaked on the energy sector of this country. We now have a committee of the Senate that has the opportunity to examine what has happened in and to the energy sector and particularly to the petroleum business since October of 1980.

What I would like to do briefly, but thoroughly, is to consider the impact of the National Energy Program on our national economy. The National Energy Program introduced by the MacEachen budget on October 28, 1980, featured a big tax grab. There were a number of new taxes, some taking a slice of the wellhead price and others loaded on top of the wellhead price. Notably, there were the petroleum gas revenue tax, which was to have raised $5 billion by 1983-84, and the the natural gas and gas liquids tax, which was to have raised some $6 billion by 1983-1984. Then there was the Canadian ownership charge that was intended to finance an increase in public ownership in the petroleum industry.

The National Energy Program also featured the so-called Canadianization proposals. They introduced a formula called the COR, the Canadian ownership rate. It was announced that the depletion allowances would be phased out and they would bring in the PIPs, petroleum incentive payments. The higher the COR, the higher the PIP and the PIPs would be higher on the so-called Canada lands. That, I presume, was intended to have the effect, as it certainly did, of discouraging exploration on lands that were under provincial jurisdiction. At the same time, the federal government reserved to itself, or to a crown corporation, a 25 per cent interest in all existing and future petroleum rights on the Canada lands.

While the impact of this announcement in Mr. MacEachen's budget of October 1980 was dramatic in the petroleum industry, it was traumatic for the Canadian economy. The tax grab was a blow to the petroleum industry, which saw its cash flow, and, therefore, its ability to carry out exploration and development, severely reduced. The Canadianization proposals, which featured discrimination against foreign capital and retroactive back-in provisions, shook the international investment community. There was a period of confrontation with the producing provinces followed by a long impasse. The immediate result was the shelving of the Cold Lake and Alsands projects. Not only were these projects essential to the government's declared goal of oil self-sufficiency, but Cold Lake and Alsands were to be our shield against the recession; our “ace in the hole” against the world recession, if I may mix metaphors.

● (1420)

The estimated cost of these projects was to have been $10 billion to $12 billion each. They would have meant thousands of construction jobs in Alberta; thousands of manufacturing jobs in eastern Canada. The 16th Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada in 1979 and the 17th Annual Review of the same body in 1980 pointed out that energy-related projects would provide the only real buoyancy in investment in the 1980s. They were referring, of course, to Cold Lake and Alsands; to the Quebec and Martimes pipeline; to the Alaska Highway gas pipeline; to the east coast pipeline. Without these, said the Economic Council, there would be a cumulative total of some 753,000 jobs lost between 1980 and 1990. The two biggest projects, namely Cold Lake and Alsands were, to all intents and purposes, sunk by the National Energy Program of the federal government.

Meanwhile, what was happening to investment exploration and development, employment and growth in the petroleum sector generally? If you look at the figures for the years 1980, 1981 and 1982, you will see that capital expenditure on exploration in 1980, before the introduction of the National Energy Program, was at $4.1 billion. In 1981, it was down to $3.7 billion; in 1982, it was down to $3.5 billion. I do not yet have the figures for 1983 but I am reliably informed that, if there has been an increase, investment will still not reach the levels that were attained before the National Energy Program was introduced.

With respect to the number of well completions in those years, in 1980 there were 3,900; in 1981, there were 3,000; in 1982, there were 2,200 and in 1983 there were 2,135. If there was devastation in the energy sector—and there was—there were thousands of jobs lost to the Canadian economy, directly and indirectly. I saw one estimate from the industry to the effect that some 20,000 jobs were lost at the field level in the drilling and servicing industries alone; that is the cost to this country of the National Energy Program.

This devastation was soon reflected in the depressed shares of oil and gas companies on the stock market. The Honourable Marc Lalonde, who was then Minister of Energy, in that off-handed way he has become so famous for, allowed as how this depression in the prices of oil and gas company shares would make it that much easier for Canadians—and one assumes in particular the Canadian government—to buy up these foreign companies. One wonders what investors, whether Canadian or foreign, would think of such a comment. I may say in passing that it did not quite turn out that the companies were taken over when share prices were at the bottom. Indeed, a couple of studies that have been done indicate that many of the purchases were done at a time when share prices were still at rather high levels.

In any event, the takeovers proceeded, induced by the National Energy Program.

In February of 1981, Petrofina was taken over for the sum of $1.45 billion. Between February and July of 1981, there were more acquisitions totalling an additional $6.6 billion. That money left Canada because of the acquisition of those assets; the value of the Canadian dollar, predictably enough, declined; interest rates were jacked up to protect the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar, and in July Mr. MacEachen cried “uncle”.

Mr. MacEachen, who had introduced the National Energy Program with its so-called Canadianization provisions during the previous October, then issued a statement asking the banks to reduce lending for takeovers involving an outflow of capital funds from Canada. Even the friends of the government must have been embarrassed by the way in which the government's incompetence had caught up with it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not those sitting here.

Senator Murray: But the damage to the government's credibility and also, unfortunately, to Canada's credibility had already been done.

In the year following Mr. MacEachen's statement of July 1981, more foreign-owned companies were acquired at a cost of a further $1.1 billion. So it was left at the end of the year to the Governor of the Bank of Canada to assess the damage, as he did in his annual report of 1981. I should like to put on the record a couple of paragraphs from that report.

Speaking generally, at page 12, Mr. Bouey stated:

One element in the generally weaker performance of the Canadian dollar against the U.S. dollar was the increase in uncertainty that followed the announcement of the National Energy Program in October 1980 and the subsequent federal-provincial energy dispute. Towards the middle of 1981 the pressure on the Canadian dollar was sharply increased by a wave of takeovers by Canadians of foreign-controlled businesses in Canada, mainly though not all in the petroleum industry.

Speaking of the downward pressure on the Canadian dollar, he stated:

... the pressure on the Canadian dollar became very great in late July and early August and the Canadian dollar lost 3 per cent in value against the U.S. dollar in the course of three weeks. The rapid slide took place notwithstanding both a sharp rise in Canadian short-term interest rates that carried them appreciably above U.S. rates and strong support for the Canadian dollar via direct intervention by the authorities in the exchange market.

At page 23 of the report, the Governor of the Bank of Canada stated:

The other component was the sale by non-residents to Canadians of some $8 billion of their controlling interests in businesses in Canada. The greater part of these takeovers was in the oil and gas industry and was in accordance with the Canadianization aspect of the National Energy Program but a considerable part was outside the energy field.

The Governor went on to state:

In the circumstances that existed, purchases of foreign-owned businesses in Canada had to be financed through additions in one way or another to Canada's interest-bearing foreign indebtedness. In most cases this was accomplished by the Canadian purchasers doing the related foreign borrowing. They did it mainly by borrowing U.S. dollars from Canadian banks, which in turn borrowed the funds on international money markets. But a significant part of the takeover activity included no arrangement for foreign financing. In those cases Canadian dollars were converted in the exchange market, putting immediate downward pressure on the Canadian dollar. In July that pressure was very great. Large sales of Canadian dollars in an exchange market that had already been unsettled by the growing scale of takeover operations triggered a steep slide in the exchange rate. As was noted in the earlier section on interest rate developments, in late July the Minister of Finance requested banks to limit their financing of such operations in order to ease the pressure on the exchange rate.

The effect on the exchange market of the foreign exchange conversions produced by the wave of takeovers was reinforced both by uncertainty as to the scale of conversions from further takeovers and by longer-term balance of payments considerations.

I ask honourable senators to pay particular attention to this next sentence, which states:

In respect of the longer term, it was clear that the annual interest cost of the foreign borrowing done to finance the takeovers would be much larger for many years than the dividend payments that would have been made by the enterprises taken over. In that way Canada's need to borrow abroad in the foreseeable future was being increased.

● (1430)

The C.D. Howe Institute, in its May 1983 study entitled "Lessons from the National Energy Program," put it even more bluntly:

Canadianization of the oil industry is a costly way of securing resource benefits for Canadians. Increasing Canadian ownership of the oil industry is one way of reducing the flow of windfall gains to the foreign owners of petroleum companies. But substantial costs are involved in Canadianization. Canadians have paid the price directly through the Canadian Ownership Charge—a tax imposed on oil and gas consumption to meet the costs of buying out foreign owners. There have also been indirect costs. Large-scale purchases of foreign-owned petroleum companies in 1981 destabilized the capital markets and played havoc with the exchange rate. The result was higher interest rates and a depreciation of the Canadian dollar, thereby increasing the cost of imports.

The C.D. Howe Institute also states:

There will be significant long-term costs as well. Foreign equity investment has been replaced with long-term foreign debt—

A point made in the annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

—which will have a continuing negative impact on the balance of payments. The poor timing of the takeovers, at the peak of the oil price boom, and the debt financing of acquisitions weaken the financial structure of the newly-acquired firms. Finally, the retroactive federal claim to an interest in existing petroleum rights shook the confidence of both domestic and foreign investors in the stability of Canada's investment climate.

I think that it is important to remember that Mr. MacEachen's budget announcing the National Energy Program came at a time when a recession was on the horizon in this country. Unfortunately, the National Energy Program succeeded in plunging Canada deeper into recession, weakening the dollar, adding to the costs of imports, increasing interest rates, stifling investment, causing thousands of bankruptcies and creating thousands of unemployed. That was a legacy of the National Energy Program brought in in Mr. MacEachen's budget of October 1980.

Another year was to pass, another year in which the National Energy Program was allowed to take its heavy toll on the Canadian economy, before Mr. MacEachen brought in another budget. On the evening of November 12, 1981, Mr. MacEachen came to bat again. What was the situation in the economy on November 12, 1981? The economy was in a serious tailspin. Statistics Canada, the previous week, had said, and I quote:

The marked slowdown in activity could develop into a recession during the coming months. The sharp decline in indicators of economic activity have already led firms to cut production, and layoffs have become widespread.

When Mr. MacEachen rose in his place on November 12, 1981, to present that budget, the Conference Board of Canada had already found that consumer confidence was at a 20-year low. The volume of retail sales had dropped. Canadian sales of North American automobiles were down 35 per cent in the previous month—October 1981. Corporate profits had fallen 9 per cent from the third quarter of 1981. Commercial bankruptcies were up 16 per cent over 1980. It was not hard to read the signs. The signs were abundant that Canada was heading into and was threatened with a very serious recession.

What was the response of the government through its Minister of Finance in the budget of November 12, 1981? The response was the infamous MacEachen budget of November—an unprecedented assault on the Canadian taxpayer, and anti-business, anti-investment and anti-incentive. Many forms of incomes which, historically, had been exempt from tax, or which had received preferential treatment, were now to be taxed. A number of other deductions were disallowed. Many incentives to savings, to investment and to economic growth were wiped out—incentives that had been brought in by previous governments, including previous Liberal governments.

Accrued income, including life insurance income, was to be taxed every three years. Taxes on employee benefits ranging from dental plans to the use of the company car were to jump significantly. Automatic general averaging was to be replaced by forward averaging.

Businesses were heavily hit by, for example, a 12½ per cent dividend distribution tax and the new half-year convention for capital cost allowances that has cost this country very dearly in terms of investment. The small business development bonds were gutted; MURBs were ended; and so on and so forth.

Over 100 tax changes were proposed by Mr. MacEachen on November 12, 1981, at a time when the country was heading into a recession. The immediate result was an uproar in the country—an uproar such as had never before greeted a federal budget. There was consternation as to the sense of timing and the political and economic judgment of a government that would make such outrageous tax proposals when the country expected, and had a right to expect, a budget that would be aimed at fighting the recession.

Then began the confusion, the backtracking and the flip-flopping. Between November 12 and December 18, 1981, 18 changes were announced in the MacEachen budget, but, of course, the minister stayed on, oblivious to constitutional convention and to the tradition under which ministers who have to swallow important parts of their budgets stand down and resign from cabinet. This government has neither self-respect nor respect for constitutional convention. There were 18 changes between November and December; between January 1982 and May 1982 six more changes were announced; on June 28, 1982, 11 more changes were announced; on October 27, 1982, eight more changes were announced—

Senator Frith: Responsiveness.

Senator Murray: —and between October 27 and December 6, 1982, two more changes were announced.

Senator Frith: Open-mindedly improving at all times.

Senator Murray: Since that time, how many more? That budget was gutted, and the Minister of Finance at the time should have resigned.

Senator Frith: Dramatically and democratically improved.

Senator Murray: I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government, who is interjecting from his seat, to consider what the effect of all this would be on any serious-minded investor, businessman, consumer, taxpayer, whether in Canada or in any other country. What would he say? He would say, "This is a government that does not know what it is doing; this is a government that has its priorities all wrong; this is a government that is incompetent," and he would be right.

Honourable senators, I lost count at about 55; there were 55 substantial changes in that budget, and counting the number of measures that were changed not once but two or three times the number of changes is probably in the sixties.

Senator Frith: Always fine-tuning for improvement.

Senator Murray: This was the November 12, 1981 budget, coming as the country was threatened with recession and coming a year after the inception of the National Energy Program that had already caused such devastation. This November budget of 1981 set off two to three years of confusion, of backtracking and of amendment.

Senator Frith: We did debate that budget.

Senator Murray: The year that followed was devastating. The budget was grievously damaging to the Canadian economy because it had a devastating effect on confidence. I am saying to the Deputy Leader of the Government and to other honourable senators that the debris of Mr. MacEachen's November budget still litters the economic landscape of this country.

● (1440)

Senator Frith: Speaking of phrase-making, that will do until something better comes along.

Senator Murray: I am glad that the Deputy Leader of the Government finds my description of the situation so apt.

Senator Frith: Would that he did!

Senator Murray: We waited for seven months and Mr. MacEachen came to bat—or was it that he came to the surface—for the third time with his budget of June 28, 1982. In good part because of Mr. MacEachen's two previous budgets and the economic policy of this government, the Canadian economy, by this time, was deeply into recession.

By the time Mr. MacEachen presented his third budget on June 28, 1982, the gross national product had fallen in three consecutive quarters. The first quarter corporate profits were at 41 per cent of their 1981 level. Manufacturing output was at 70 per cent of capacity. The transportation industry was operating at 51 per cent of capacity. Unemployment was at 10.2 per cent. The Conference Board of Canada found that consumer confidence was at its lowest level in the 20-year history of the consumer attitudes index. Business confidence was at its lowest level in the five-year history of the business opinion survey. Such was the wreckage that faced Allan MacEachen—caused in good part by his own policies—when he rose to his feet on June 28, 1982.

This time, with the country mired in a recession, what was his response? It was this gigantic public relations exercise known as the six-and-five program, of which the Deputy Leader of the Government and others are so proud. Federal public sector wages, family allowance, old age security, public service pensions and federally-administered prices were to be restrained to increases of 6 per cent and 5 per cent. As an attack on inflation, it was an attack on a very small part of the inflation problem. I ask honourable senators how much of recent inflation is accounted for by family allowances, by old age security, by pension increases, by public service wage increases or even by federally-administered prices? I suggest that quite a small part of recent inflation in this country can be attributed directly to those causes.

Inflation has fallen since June of 1982, although it is still higher in Canada than in the countries that are our major competitors and trading partners. It has fallen because Canada has plunged into a deep economic recession.

What is worrisome about inflation is that the conditions exist for a resurgence of it at almost the first sign of economic recovery. These conditions have not been addressed by the government. The weakness of the Canadian dollar adds to the cost of imports. Government spending each year has been higher than nominal growth in the gross national product, notwithstanding the commitment given by Prime Minister Trudeau in 1980 to keep spending increases below the growth of the GNP and notwithstanding the fact that every year the government forecasts that this objective will be achieved the following year.

Taxation continues to grow, but the federal deficit has continued to rise. It was $12.6 billion in 1980-81, $13.6 billion in 1981-2, $24.6 billion in 1982-83, $31.4 billion in 1983-84, and Mr. Lalonde now forecasts a small decrease to $29.6 billion in the current fiscal year. The forecasts of this government have been so wildly inaccurate in the recent past that I wonder who can take them seriously?

In any case, if the economy should falter—as it shows every sign of doing—I regret to say that the deficit projection made by Mr. Lalonde in his budget last month will prove to be quite short of the mark.

Government taxing, government borrowing and government spending continue to grow. These are important elements of Canada's problem of inflation that have not been tackled by the six-and-five or by any other government program. We will have a borrowing bill in this chamber within the next few days, and this will give honourable senators an opportunity to discuss the record of the government in this respect in somewhat more detail. Suffice it to say, for the moment, that there is very little confidence among Canadians that inflation will not break out very quickly, if there is any sustained recovery in economic growth.

To resume my narrative, honourable senators, on September 10, 1982, Mr. MacEachen was taken out of the Finance portfolio and elevated or translated to External Affairs. Mr. Lalonde, the hero of the National Energy Program, was made Minister of Finance. On October 27 he presented a mini-budget, which was a financial statement with some revised forecasts of revenues and expenditures and some further retreats from the disastrous MacEachen budget of November 1981. It was on April 19, 1983, that Mr. Lalonde brought in his first formal budget.

What had happened in the 10 months that had elapsed since Allan MacEachen's last hurrah—since his previous budget? In 1982, the Canadian economy had fallen by 4.8 per cent in real terms, which was the worst decline of any OECD country. Between the middle of 1981 and April of 1983 real GNP had fallen by 7.5 per cent; real GNP per capita in this country was lower on budget day, April 15, 1983, than it had been in 1976; 1.6 million Canadians were unemployed; in the fourth quarter of 1982, Canadian manufacturing was operating at 63 per cent of capacity, the lowest level since records had started to be kept in 1961. Primary metals were operating at 55 per cent of capacity; transportation equipment at 43 per cent of capacity; the wood industry at 54 per cent of capacity; the electronics industry at 63 per cent of capacity and the furniture industry at 55 per cent of capacity. Business capital investment was still falling, corporate profits were down 24 per cent in the fourth quarter of 1982 over 1981, and 11,000 businesses had declared bankruptcy. Further, the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses had estimated that, if we were to count the receiverships and the number of businesses that simply closed their doors and walked away, approximately 80,000 small businesses had folded in 1982.

Into that situation on April 19, 1983, with his first formal budget, came Marc Lalonde. Full of bounce and full of beans, he could not wait to present his first budget to the House of Commons. He invited the photographers in and began grandstanding, showing them copies of the budget speech. The inevitable happened—a photographer caught part of the document on film and details of the budget were published before

[Senator Murray.]

Mr. Lalonde rose to his feet in the house. The tradition, the constitutional convention under those circumstances, is very clear: the Minister of Finance resigns. Not in this government; not with this minister; oh, no. What happened was that Mr. Lalonde decided to make the leak inaccurate by adding another $200 million to the spending—another $200 million to the deficit—this is $200 million to save Mr. Lalonde's face.

Senator Frith: What budget are we debating here?

Senator Flynn: We have to look at things in perspective.

Senator Frith: I suppose we should be glad we started in 1980, not 1880.

Senator Murray: With the economy in the desperate shape that I have just detailed, how could anyone take seriously a minister or a government who behave like clowns?

There was great fanfare surrounding Mr. Lalonde's so-called job creation package, and, in particular, the special recovery capital projects. We have heard a great deal about those, as to how they are administered and how the projects are chosen. But when one came to the fine print, even after the special recovery program, Mr. Lalonde's budget documents were forecasting that there would be 55,000 fewer people with jobs in 1984 than there had been in 1981 when the Honourable Allan MacEachen kicked off the recession.

But the most important feature of Mr. Lalonde's April 1983 budget—and I hope it is not overlooked in all of the publicity attached to his zoom lens episode—was the introduction of almost $6 billion in tax increases to come in over the succeeding four years. I might say in passing that, notwithstanding the $6 billion in tax increases, Mr. Lalonde is still forecasting deficits in the $25 billion to $30 billion range.

Then, last month—on February 15—we had Mr. Lalonde's most recent budget. It was full of promise. There was a proposal on mortgage protection; there was another on small business tax relief; another on profit sharing and pensions. There were all kinds of proposals to be given further study—I repeat, “further study”. Perhaps action would come at some unspecified time in the indefinite future. They did increase the guaranteed income supplement for the single elderly by $25 in July and $25 in December. A parliamentary task force had recommended up to $102 per month for those receiving the maximum GIS, the amount of the increase to depend on the sources of other income. I saw one estimate that said that even with this increase the single elderly would be some $1,900 below the poverty line.

With the exception of $150 million announced for the Youth Opportunity Fund, there was nothing to address Canada's unemployment problem. We are going to have double-digit unemployment this year and next year. But what is rather tragic about this budget, in my opinion, is that the validity of its economic assumptions, and therefore its credibility, has been attacked from all sides.

The Senate will recall that Mr. Lalonde forecast that real gross national product this year would grow by 4.9 per cent and in 1985 by 3.5 per cent. Almost every qualified commentator that I have heard states that these assumptions are excessively rosy. The realization of these assumptions would depend on what the Conference Board calls a "continuing and simultaneous movement of all elements of demand." I may say that the Conference Board forecast that real GNP this year will not be Mr. Lalonde's 4.9 per cent but, rather, 3.3 per cent, and that next year it will not be Mr. Lalonde's 3.5 per cent but, rather, 0.3 per cent.

With regard to the capital investment intentions in this country, Mr. Lalonde's budget seems to indicate that he has set his face against the available evidence. In January the government's own Department of Regional Industrial Expansion published a survey indicating that Canada's larger firms will have negative levels of capital investment in 1984. I have the study here. I also have the Statistics Canada study, which indicates that while its capital investment survey shows some increase in residential and government capital investment, it still shows business cutting back quite sharply in its investment intentions. Indeed, the Statistics Canada document, published on March 2 last, which is since Mr. Lalonde's budget, indicates that total business capital investment in 1984 will be down 0.4 per cent from 1983, and, at the same time, it indicates that total business capital investment for 1983 was down 10.1 per cent over 1982. So Mr. Lalonde's assumptions—the assumptions on which he bases his forecast of economic growth, and, with them, forecasts of revenue, and so on—are seen to be excessively optimistic even by the government's own agencies in the latest surveys and reports they have issued.

In the fourth quarter of 1983, real GNP grew by 0.9 per cent; but final domestic demand, which excludes inventory, savings and exports, fell by 0.1 per cent. To quote the Conference Board again:

There are worrisome signs that the recovery might not be as robust as otherwise might be expected.

To talk about the rosy assumptions for economic growth, let us take a look at what Mr. Lalonde, the Minister of Finance, himself said at page 15 of the budget document entitled The Canadian Economy In Recovery. I would ask honourable senators to pay particular attention to this sentence:

A crucial aspect of the medium-term projection is the underlying view of moderate sustained declines in interest rates—

Well, honourable senators have seen what has happened since the budget. We have a bank rate of 10.56 per cent and rising, threatening to choke off growth and investment and to wipe out the recovery in its infancy.

Senator Frith: A temporary mutation.

Senator Murray: The Deputy Leader of the Government says that this is a temporary mutation. Well, we shall see.

Senator Frith: The Conference Board said today that inflation was going to stay at about 5 per cent. Are you going to quote that, or are they not qualified?

Senator Murray: I would remind my honourable friend, who is quoting the Conference Board with such pleasure and authority, that if our inflation is going to stay in the 5 per cent range, the rate of inflation in the United States is 4.1 per cent and, in Japan, 1.8 per cent—and those countries are among our principal competitors and partners.

Senator Bosa: What about the rest of the list?

Senator Murray: The figure for West Germany is 3.1 per cent, and I regret to have to inform Senator Bosa that the latest figure for Italy is not very encouraging; it is 12.4 per cent. For those honourable senators who are interested in the figure for Sweden, it is 8 per cent. Even the United Kingdom has a lower inflation rate than ours. At last report it was 5.1 per cent.

If the economic forecasts in Mr. Lalonde's budget are unduly optimistic—as most people have said they were, and as the indications a month after the budget seem to say—then there will be slower economic growth than forecast, there will be higher unemployment than forecast, there will be lower federal government revenues than forecast, there will be higher federal government transfer payments than forecast, there will be a higher deficit than forecast, there will be even higher interest rates, and Canada will be in danger of entering into a new recession.

Such, honourable senators, is the legacy of five budgets and a couple of mini-budgets brought in by the Liberal government since its return to office in February 1980. Unemployment has gone from 7.5 per cent in 1980 to 11.9 per cent last year, to 11.3 per cent last month. The deficit last year was in the $30 billion range and this year $1 of every $3 in revenue will go toward servicing the debt.

It must be clear to honourable senators that what is needed is a restoration of economic leadership by the government, some discipline in the government, some consistency in policy, and a restoration of confidence on the part of the private sector. I have no hesitation in saying that it will take an election to achieve these things.

• (1500)

Senator Frith: Thank you, sunshine.

Senator Flynn: We had all forgotten about these things, even Senator Bosa.

Senator Bosa: I would like to put a question to Senator Murray. Has he forgotten that the United States stopped buying lumber, which is why the economy in British Columbia has suffered and the same thing has happened all over the world? It was not Mr MacEachen's budget that caused the recession.

Senator Murray: I would be interested to hear the honourable senator elaborate on his thesis that the depression of the house-building industry in the United States has caused the devastation that has taken place in our economy in the past four years since the Liberal government took office. At the same time, I would like him to address himself to the effect of the National Energy Program on investment confidence and business confidence, and the lack of a coherent, consistent economic and fiscal policy on this country.

Senator Asselin: Again, he hit it right on the nose.

Senator Flynn: Don't you think that the government has enough trouble without your trying to help?

On motion of Senator Côtteau, debate adjourned.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEXICAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION ACCOMPANIED BY AMBASSADOR OF MEXICO

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of a delegation of parliamentarians from Mexico. The leader of the delegation is Senator Celso Humberto Delgado Ramirez. Also in attendance is the Ambassador of Mexico to Canada, His Excellency Jose Andres de Oteyza.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SENATE REFORM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on the Reform of the Senate, tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1984.—
(Honourable Senator Robichaud, P.C.)

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, it is with deep humility that I take the floor before this august assembly, immediately after my colleague Senator Lowell Murray who has given us all kinds of figures. He has almost convinced me that the Government had been erring since Confederation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No!

Senator Robichaud: Almost, I said, but not quite. As usual, Senator Murray was well informed and his contribution to the debate is greatly appreciated. I am sure that when the Minister of Finance is made aware of the enlightening remarks of Senator Murray, the Government will adopt an entirely new monetary and tax policy.

In any case, I commend him for his contribution; under our democratic system, we must criticize often. We must criticize often, even the people and the institutions we love. Ever since the report was tabled on January 31 last, we have been urged to criticize the Senate and reform this institution. I obtained from the Library of Parliament part of the documents which have been piling up over the years about the reform of the Senate.

There are quite a few books on the subject. I did not count them—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Did you read them all?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Robichaud: In direct answer to the question, I did not read them all.

Senator Flynn: That will be obvious in your speech.

Senator Robichaud: I read those which I thought made sense.

Senator Flynn: Hear, hear! If you did not read them all, how do you know?

Senator Robichaud: All one needs to do is read the table of contents intelligently.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: You have a friend there.

Senator Guay: I read the books which Senator Robichaud did not read.

[English]

Senator Robichaud: To be a reformist is absolutely nothing new to a Liberal. I have always claimed that I am a Liberal. I still am a Liberal and a reformist.

Senator Flynn: With a big "L".

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And a big "R", too.

Senator Robichaud: I am proud to be labelled a Liberal because it is in my nature to be a reformist, but only when reform is due or is needed.

Senator Asselin: So you support the conclusions of the report because you are a reformist?

Senator Robichaud: Perhaps Senator Asselin will be patient for a few minutes; actually, I do not know how long it will be because I did not have time to prepare a short speech.

Senator Flynn: What else is new?

Senator Guay: Ask Senator Murray how to do it.

Senator Robichaud: All of my colleagues within the sound of my voice and those who read Hansard or whatever is produced following this, will know that in New Brunswick I was the greatest reformer in the history of the province.

Senator Flynn: You are the first to tell us; we never heard that before.

Senator Robichaud: When we assumed office on July 12, 1960, I realized that reform was due. I realized that in certain counties people were being penalized because of geographic location; ethnic background and so on. If you did not belong to a certain society, you did not belong.

I was very instrumental in reforming the whole system of the administration of justice, the hospital insurance plan, the medicare plan—

Senator Asselin: What about the Senate?

Senator Robichaud: Will you wait a second or two? If you are trying to distract me, you will not be successful.

Senator Asselin: We are discussing Senate reform, not the policies of New Brunswick.

Senator Robichaud: If you do not want to listen to me, you know the way out.

I abolished the county councils, which had existed for many years. I abolished them because I was a reformist—and I still am, which is what I want to prove here. Being a reformist does not mean you have to reform everything that exists.

• (1510)

Senator Flynn: Especially not yourself!

Senator Robichaud: In my estimation, the Senate of Canada needs reform—but not the type of reform recommended in the report submitted to us by the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform.

[Translation]

The first paragraph of the report reads as follows, and I am referring to the first two lines, plus three words:

[English]

We have concluded that the Canadian Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada.

[Translation]

The Senate has been in existence since Confederation, in 1867, with all its imperfections and all its qualities. Since 1867, people have been criticizing the Senate and the House of Commons. They have been criticizing all our institutions. Is anything better being proposed? Not much. Who are these people who are criticizing the Senate? Most of them are theorists.

[English]

They are people who have never been involved in politics; professors from certain universities—big shots. They speak from their ivory towers; they know everything about the operation of the Senate. They are the authors of some of the books I have in front of me. They are the very opposite of pragmatists; they do not know anything about practical politics. Yet, they are the ones who would like to abolish the Senate or have an elected one. Let me say this: An elected Senate would be non-operative in this country.

Those who have read the report will remember the part of it that says that it is essential the Senate be divorced from politics, or that political affiliations be forgotten. And they want an elected Senate? How can that be reconciled? It is impossible. If we are to have an elected Senate, then we will have political parties; if we are to have political parties, then we will have partisan politicians in the Senate—that is unavoidable. That is pragmatism. It is not a theory which has been invented by someone speaking from a pulpit at a university, such as Gordon Robertson.

Yesterday I read an article in a publication entitled Policy Options, which is a periodical published every so often. I consider Gordon Robertson a good personal friend of mine. He is a good man in some respects. However, as far as the Senate is concerned he is a nincompoop. He does not realize or understand the operation of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: He has not been close enough to government, that is why.

Senator Robichaud: He has been close to government and he wants an elected Senate. I wonder why he never ran for office at any time.

Senator Flynn: It was much safer for him to be where he was.

Senator Robichaud: Yes. I have taken a great many notes of what the people have said on this subject. On the first page of the report, it is stated:

Some highly respected people in public life and in the academic community prefer a reformed system of appointment to election. Among this group is one member of our Committee.

I think I know who that member of the committee is. However, when you come to talk to individual members of the committee you will find that they are opposed to an elected Senate. I, too, am opposed to an elected Senate. I can say with all the candour at my command that, if the time comes when we must have an elected Senate, then I will run for office and I will be elected. I am not afraid of that. I could be elected in my province. However, because I can be elected does not necessarily mean that I will be a good legislator. There are a great many people here who are extremely good administrators. I am looking at one right now: Senator Sinclair. He never offered to run for public office and yet he is considered to be one of the brilliant minds in the Canadian business world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Robichaud: He was not elected to the Senate, he was appointed. He is not the only one. I could name those appointed on the other side, right from the back bench to the front bench, and also from the back bench to the front bench on this side. All these people were appointed to the Senate; they were not elected. That does not mean that they cannot perform their duties. In looking over a list of Senate appointments, I found that they were not always made according to political affiliation. For instance, Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who has just given notice of his resignation, appointed the former Conservative Premier of Nova Scotia, Ike Smith, as a senator in 1975.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Robichaud: In 1975 the Prime Minister appointed our friend from Cape Breton, Senator Muir, to the Senate. He served as a Conservative member of Parliament from Cape Breton. In 1978 he appointed Senator Marshall from Newfoundland, also a past Conservative member of Parliament. He is a good senator, too. In 1972 he had the audacity to appoint Senator Martial Asselin—a senator who devotes a lot of his time to the Senate. In 1955 Prime Minister St. Laurent appointed an independent senator by the name of Hartland Molson. In 1970, Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau appointed to the Senate a former Social Credit premier of Alberta, Senator Manning. He, too, was a good senator. I could go on—

• (1520)

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: You forgot that Senator Roblin was also appointed by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

Senator Robichaud: I am sorry, honourable senators. His name was also on my list. Yes, in 1978, Senator Duff Roblin, a former premier of Manitoba, was appointed to the Senate by Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Senator Flynn: You should beg forgiveness for the bad appointments.

Senator Leblanc: That was a very good appointment.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister must be praised for his open-mindedness—

Senator Flynn: You can say that again!

Senator Robichaud:—and his willingness, on the advice of his executive council, to appoint people who can effectively carry out the duties of a member of the Senate, and who are not constantly giggling for no reason at all.

Senator Flynn: If I always laugh when Senator Robichaud is speaking, it is because I always find what he says to be so funny!

Senator Robichaud: Personally, if I do not always laugh when Senator Flynn is speaking, it is because I do not always find what he says to be funny!

Senator Flynn: I am always serious.

[English]

Senator Robichaud: At this point, I would like to quote from the report—

Senator Frith: What page?

We recognize that, in the absence of proportional representation for an elected Senate, the political parties will have to work hard to achieve balanced representation from across the country in the Commons and the Senate. This is as it should be. In striving to do this, they will have to adapt their policies accordingly, and this can only benefit national politics.

I tried to convince myself that I understood what that meant, but I was not successful.

Senator Frith: And you are pretty eloquent.

Senator Robichaud: In any event, my notation on that was, “ridiculous”. Of course we have to strive to achieve national policies that will be to the benefit of all the people of Canada. That is motherhood. We all know that. However, although I do not know what that paragraph means, I do not intend to question any of the members of the committee with respect to it.

Again on page 3 my note was, “essential element missing” and perhaps I should quote the whole paragraph:

We also propose that every effort be made to ensure that senators have a significant degree of independence of party.

[Senator Robichaud.]

In this instance, I will imitate Mr. Reagan, the President of the United States, and I will say, “Well . . .”.

Only then will they be able to speak in favour of local and regional interests without having to be concerned primarily, as members of Parliament must be, with adhering to party policy.

If we have an elected Senate, presumably the senators will belong to political parties. How, then, will it be possible for us to come here and sit ten months of the year and, for those ten months, become non-political? My notation on that one was, “ridiculous”.

However, let me continue:

A healthy measure of independence is therefore essential . . .

and I underlined the word “essential”.

. . . if the Senate is to fill its role of regional representation. This does not mean that senators would lose sight of the needs of the country as a whole.

Of course senators would not lose sight of the needs of the country as a whole. In that paragraph, I noted the word “essential”. In other words, the report is saying that it is essential for senators to be completely divorced from politics within the boundaries of these four walls. How can we achieve that goal if we have an elected Senate? To me, it is simply an incredible suggestion.

[Translation]

I have listened to many speeches, all of an academic value, on the issue under consideration. More specifically, I have read and re-read Senator Le Moyne's speech which was very well put together and showed good common sense. I have also listened to my friend, Senator Denis, who made a very good speech about the reform or non-reform of the Senate two weeks ago, I believe.

Why do people still want to reform the Senate when we have institutions, such as our universities—not necessarily all the good ones—our colleges, our community colleges, our judicial system, our Parliament, our House of Commons and our Senate, as well as our churches which have different philosophies and are not perfect? But how can you expect perfection? Nothing is perfect. Nothing was perfect in our own homes, nothing can be perfect in the Senate, and nothing will ever be perfect especially if we insist on having an elected Senate.

I have gone to the trouble of looking at the list of committee chairmen. This is where we do our work, and if the media would only look into this, they would be able to tell the public that a tremendous amount of work is done in the Senate. The committee report says so somewhere, and I would like to quote from it:

[English]

In recent years the Senate has investigated a number of important public issues, including poverty, the mass media, unemployment, inflation, aging, land use, science policy, national defence, relations with the United States and the proposed national security agency.

[Translation]

This is some of the useful work accomplished by the Senate, but, as usual, the Senate is humble, and in its humility it has forgotten to publicize its work as it should have done. Indeed, the report says that national policies have been changed because of the Senate.

The Senate is said to cost the Canadian taxpayers a huge amount of money, but it is peanuts compared with the services it can provide. People want an elected Senate, but this would cost considerably more. It is ridiculous.

I have taken down the names of all committee chairmen, from the Committee on Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries to the Committee on Transport and Communications. I have looked at the qualifications of all these committee chairmen and noted that the great majority were never elected, but they all are excellent committee chairmen who are playing a major role through their committee; all are a credit to the Senate.

I would also like to speak about regional and ethnic representation. Somewhere in the committee report, it is said that an elected Senate will solve problems—problems that have plagued us for the last decade.

• (1530)

Oh, my God! The problems in this country did not start ten years ago; the problems started when the country was created. Such problems exist in all countries. We are fortunate to have been born in Canada, and we are fortunate that this country was not created as a result of a revolution, as was France, the United States, Russia, Mexico, Italy and other countries. The majority of countries in the world were created as a result of a revolution.

The report states that the package of recommendations will eradicate certain problems that have plagued this country for a decade. Those problems have not existed for just a decade; they have existed, as I said earlier, since the country was created. We will continue to have problems. We may continue to have linguistic problems in provinces such as Manitoba and Quebec.

An Hon. Senator: I hope not.

Senator Robichaud: We hope we will not, but we will have to fight to see that we do not. That is why we exist as a Senate. We have a duty to represent the regions of the country. I, as a senator, abhor what is happening currently in Manitoba.

[Translation]

I cannot praise the Province of Quebec for its attitude towards the official languages of Canada. I wish we could speak openly and freely, without anyone suggesting anything with a text, and speak with an open heart.

I conclude, although I would have much more to say, but I will do so on another occasion. I recall that when I was a student I read a biography of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of Canada's outstanding men among so many others. He had studied all the deficiencies of our institutions—the Senate, the House of Commons and the judicial system. If I remember correctly, I think he was in London when he said: "I love France which gave me life, I love England which gave me freedom, but above all I love Canada, my native country".

On motion of Senator Flynn, debated adjourned.

HEALTH SERVICES

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-3

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-3, intituled: "An Act relating to cash contributions by Canada in respect of insured health services provided under provincial health care insurance plans and amounts payable by Canada in respect of extended health care services and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the Committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.—
(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order was stood earlier this day, and, as I mentioned earlier, I had discussions with Senator Flynn and now have had an opportunity to discuss this matter with Senator Bonnell.

One of the concerns raised by Senators Macdonald, Flynn and Roblin has been cleared up, and the other concern related to the issue of the committee now having the power to adjourn from place to place within Canada, without having any immediate travel plans. I now understand that Senator Bonnell is prepared to withdraw that part of the motion. If Senator Bonnell will confirm that I am right, the motion can then be put in its amended form.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, this issue arose because the members of the committee desired to meet with some of the provincial premiers. We just wanted that authority in the event we had to use it. I am not sure of this, but I believe that the premiers do not wish us to travel to the provincial capitals; or, at least, we have not received any requests to do so.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move that the motion be amended by deleting the second paragraph thereof. If it turns out that the premiers do want to discuss this with us, we can always ask the Senate for permission to travel to the provincial capitals.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are prepared to agree to this amended motion because I was informed at noon today that the minister, Madame Bégin, is to table in a committee of the other place today some amendments to the legislation which, apparently, meet the objections made by some of the provincial governments—more specifically, the objections raised by Mr. Johnson of Quebec. We will be able to study those amendments when we receive them and will then be able to deal with the subject-matter in a proper fashion.

I would have hesitated to allow the motion to be passed had we not known the amendments the minister wished to move, because we would not have known what kind of bill we would have been dealing with, but, in the circumstances, we support this motion.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in anticipation that this motion would carry, the committee had made tentative plans to have the minister appear before it tomorrow at 3.30 p.m. I understand that that plan is now confirmed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

That the committee be authorized to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, leave was sought to move this motion last Thursday. The Senate decided to leave the matter for consideration until today and, therefore, it was treated as a notice of motion. I now ask for support of the motion.

Motion agreed to.

GREECE

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF COMMENCEMENT OF WAR OF INDEPENDENCE

[Translation]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, Sunday, March 25, is the National Holiday of Greece. That day will be the 163rd anniversary of the commencement of the War of Independence of the Greek people.

I will not talk to you about the glories or the sacrifices of Greece, for you have read about them in history books.

[English]

Instead, I would like to tell you that, each year at about this time, when winter is still lingering here in Canada and the blossoms are blooming in Greece by its turquoise sea, I ask myself: Why am I here and not there?

[Translation]

Why am I here and not there, by the sea, enjoying the warmth of Apollo's chariot?

[English]

Why I am not there, with the sun in my face and with a pitcher of wine by my side? I have 25 million answers to that question. I am here because of the 25 million wonderful men and women who compose this country, and especially the women. By that I am not trying to suggest that I am a Lothario, but I do appreciate them; they are marvellous. This has been a very generous land.

[Translation]

Indeed, this marvelous country which is Canada has been very generous towards its new citizens. We have been welcomed with warmth and accepted wholeheartedly.

[English]

Canada has made it possible for us to remember our origins with pride and affection, but also to feel unquestioned love and loyalty for Canada. I thank you all for that. In the past 16 years, Canada has also given us, the Greeks who live here, a man to cherish: Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Those of you who may think it eccentric of me to be a Liberal will approve of my loyalty, I am sure, for you yourselves are loyal.

[Translation]

Undoubtedly you have heard Greek people shouting "Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau". We see in him one of the outstanding figures of Greek history.

[English]

We see in him parallels with Pericles, the leader of the Athenian Golden Age. The fifth century B.C. Pericles, too, had a penchant for hats; he, too, liked squiring beautiful entertainers of the opposite sex. His Aspasia was the Barbra Streisand of the fifth century B.C. Pericles gave public contracts to an architect friend of his named Phidias, the Erickson of his day. The Acropolis was the result.

Like Mr. Trudeau, Pericles was a constitutionalist who amended the constitution and entrenched the rights of citizens. Pericles, too, was criticized for spending on public projects; for philosophizing in public; for being intellectually aloof; for telling people what they ought to hear rather than what would please them.

Pericles was elected ruler for 16 years, save for a brief nine-month period. He was a great democrat, a great servant of the people. History has never forgotten him. Pitt the Elder insisted that his son, William Pitt the Younger, who defeated Napoleon, read, in Greek, at Eton of Pericles' deeds. Pericles' record, said Pitt the Elder, was the manual of statesmen. That is what we Greek Canadians feel about the record of Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Please try to be relevant.

Senator Gigantès: We Greeks who did not have the privilege of being Canadian by birth, but have the pride of being Canadian by choice, have felt at home here. You have made us feel at home. Vous nous avez ouvert les bras. You made us all feel that nothing could be more appropriate than to celebrate Greece's feast of freedom in this marvellous land of freedom, and we love you. Je vous aime.

BYELORUSSIA

SIXTY-SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, for several years we have been paying tribute in the Senate chamber to national groups in Canada on the occasion of their national holiday. It has now become customary to mark such occasions for the Irish, Scots, Ukrainians, Estonians, Latvians, Lithuanians, Italians, Poles, and sometimes others. Today we paid tribute to the Greeks. This symbolic feature helps to characterize the Senate as a defender of the rights of minorities, together with the rights of majorities.

Today I am drawing the attention of honourable senators to one of the small ethno-cultural groups, namely, the Byelorussian Canadians, the bulk of whom came to this country after World War II. The Byelorussians are of Slavic origin, with a distinctive culture and language which has some similarities to their neighbours, the Russians, Ukrainians and Poles. Today their country is a Soviet republic, with representation in the United Nations.

However, the aspirations of the Byelorussians in their homeland were directed to freedom and independence. During the interval, when the Tsarist Russian empire crumbled and the Russian communists, led by Lenin, gained control of the government in Petrograd and Moscow in 1917-18, most of the non-Russian peoples proclaimed their independence and established their own republics. The Ukrainians were the first, on January 22, 1918, and they were immediately followed by the Estonians, Lithuanians and others. The Byelorussians proclaimed their freedom and independence on March 25, 1918, establishing the Byelorussian National Republic. There was great rejoicing throughout the country at that time.

Their freedom and independence, however, were short lived, unlike the Baltic nations which received recognition from the Western powers and maintained their democratic states until 1941, when they too were overrun by Soviet forces. The superior Russian communist forces, because of the proximity, crushed the independent, democratic Byelorussian Republic in 1919 and incorporated it into the Soviet system, as was done with Ukraine in 1920. Patriotic Byelorussians were massacred, hundreds of thousands were sent to forced labour camps in Russia and Siberia, and few were able to escape to freedom.

During the Second World War, Byelorussia suffered tremendously from the ravages of war and the Nazi and Russian armies. There was large-scale destruction of life and property. Some Byelorussians succeeded in fleeing to freedom. Several thousand found their way to Canada, where they have proven to be constructive citizens, participating fully in all aspects of Canadian life.

These free Byelorussians continue to celebrate their independence day every March 25, which this year falls on Sunday next. This will be the sixty-sixth anniversary. I am sure that all honourable senators will heartily join with me in conveying to them our congratulations and best wishes for success in their new life in Canada and the fulfilment of their greatest aspiration, namely, the freedom of their motherland.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45 (1) (g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 27, 1984, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, I will explain if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the last time we dealt with this motion the question arose as to whether our experimental schedule, of sitting on Tuesday afternoons and not sitting on Wednesday afternoons in order to give more time for committees, was working. We have been following it for several months.

When the question arose I promised that the schedule would be reviewed at a meeting of committee chairmen. That meeting took place today. The committee chairmen feel that they can work as effectively, if not more effectively, with the former schedule. In accordance with their feelings, I promised I would ask the Senate to consider a return to the old system. I believe this is in accord with the feelings of other senators who have spoken to me expressing the view that they did not see any substantial advantage to the practice of sitting on Tuesday afternoon as opposed to Tuesday evening.

Obviously, the next question was whether or not we should give a week's notice to honourable senators before implementing the system, particularly for the sake of senators' travel arrangements and for the purpose of committee meetings which might be scheduled for next week based on the present system.

With respect to the first point, it was felt that since the proposed change would be less burdensome as far as travel plans are concerned, changing the sitting from Tuesday afternoon to Tuesday evening would not be seriously inconvenient. With respect to the second point, the only committee meetings which would be affected are two meetings scheduled for, I believe, 1.30 and 2 o'clock, respectively, on Wednesday next. Therefore, it was felt that we should implement the system and allow those committees the benefit of the new system, which is, in fact, a return to the old system. It was felt that we should allow those committees to meet as planned, and that we would adjourn on Tuesday evening to Wednesday at 4 p.m. in order to allow an adjustment for that week. After that, we would complete this particular segment of the session on the basis of committee meetings being held at any time on Tuesday mornings or Tuesday afternoons; the Senate sitting on Tuesday evenings; leaving Wednesday mornings free for caucus meetings, as usual; and sitting on Wednesday afternoons at 2 o'clock, with the unwritten understanding that committees could begin meeting at 3 o'clock or 3.30. We would leave time available for committee meetings by not sitting past 3 o'clock or 3.30. We would then sit again on Thursdays at 2 p.m.

Honourable senators, that brings me to a more specific notice with respect to next week's business. We expect that the appropriation bill, which will be affected by the National Finance Committee report on supplementary estimates (C), will be passed today in the other place. However, it will not be passed until 5.45 or 6 o'clock. By that time we will have adjourned and it will not be possible for us to receive the message until next week. The intention at this time is to sit on Tuesday evening next, as I have said, and our business at that time would be to hear from Senator Doody with respect to the report of the National Finance Committee on supplementary estimates (C). I shall introduce the appropriation bill that evening and it will be debated. I hope we will be able to move to the second reading stage that same evening. Normally, such a bill is not referred to the committee because it has been pre-studied by reason of the supplementary estimates.

The Department of Finance has asked me if the bill could be given Royal Assent by Wednesday, March 28. As yet, I have not received an explanation with respect to why it is important, from the department's point of view, to have Royal Assent by March 28. The reason remains esoteric to me, at least, and it apparently relates to accounts on cheques which the department can write, or something of that nature. In any event, I will ask the Senate to try to move to Royal Assent by Wednesday evening. If that is not possible, we will have to try to have Royal Assent on Thursday. At any rate, some time during the next week Royal Assent ought to be given to the appropriation bill. We may receive other business next week as well—for example, the borrowing authority. If so, we will have to deal with that.

● (1420)

In summary, honourable senators, next week we will go back to the former system. The Senate will sit on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock; on Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock—just for next week, and on Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I might add that what Senator Frith has said is the result of a meeting that took place this morning, and that it meets with the approval of those of us on this side who were present.

I am not sure whether Senator Frith mentioned that, with respect to the Wednesday afternoon sittings of the Senate, in future we will allow, by order of the house or whatever other method, any committee to sit from 3 o'clock or 3.30 on.

Senator Frith: Yes, I did mention that.

Senator Flynn: That is fine. That is the only point I wanted to emphasize.

It is felt on this side of the chamber that there is no reason why the Senate ought not to sit on Wednesday afternoons, as it used to. With regard to committees, I think it will be easier for the committee chairmen to accommodate themselves in the time that will be available on Tuesdays, Wednesday afternoons and Thursdays.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, while I agree, generally, with the comments that have been made, there has been what appears to be a last-minute shift which places the sitting of the Senate next Wednesday at 4 o'clock rather than at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. My committee is scheduled to meet at 4 o'clock next Wednesday afternoon with some witnesses from out of town. Where do we stand?

Senator Flynn: We will give that committee permission to sit.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, later today we can revert to Notices of Motions, at which time I shall have prepared a motion permitting that committee to sit at 4 o'clock next Wednesday afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, as we did last week and as we have done on many previous Thursday afternoons, we have some questions for the Leader of the Government concerning the increase in the bank rate and concerning interest rates in this country.

It was announced a few moments ago that the bank rate will be increased another 20 basis points from 10.56 per cent, where it was this time last week, to 10.76 per cent. May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether, this week, he has come armed with some formal, prepared statement on the part of the government as to how it views this situation? In particular, is the government standing by the assumption that Mr. Lalonde himself described as "crucial" to his economic forecast and to his policy stance, namely, the assumption that interest rates would continue to decline?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Murray realizes that there are changes taking place from time to time in the financial world, in the economy, each being related to the other. I am sure that he will understand clearly that, when an upturn or increase in economic activity takes place, there is some pressure put on interest rates, particularly in the United States. That was acknowledged over the last few days by the Minister of Finance. He also acknowledged that, if we are to follow the policy that has been stated a number of times, that will have a great influence on interest rates in Canada.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this has very worrisome signs for the Canadian economy as well as for the fiscal position of the government. The Leader of the Government is surely aware that, as a result of last week's increase in the bank rate, three of the chartered banks, including one of the big five, increased their prime interest rates, and that all five major chartered banks increased their mortgage rates this week.

Is the government not concerned about the impact of rising interest rates as they affect the housing industry and as they affect the Canadian economy in general?

Senator Olson: Yes, the government is extremely concerned. I think that a number of statements made by the ministers responsible, particularly those made by the Minister of Finance, relate the interest rate generally to economic activity, and particularly the upturn in the economy. There is no question that the government is concerned about that.

The government has also stated that we must face the real world, and the real world is that, if we try to insulate ourselves from the international financial scheme, there are significant ramifications that flow from that. We take a reasonable and balanced attitude toward our participation in the freedom of finance to move in and out of Canada.

Senator Murray: What calculation is the government making as to the effect of these increases in interest rates on its own fiscal position? I ask that because that has very serious implications for the fiscal position of the government, both directly and indirectly. Interest rates continue to rise, contrary to the assumption the Minister of Finance made in his budget and, therefore, the cost of servicing the national debt will become higher than he forecast. Indirectly, increasing interest rates stifle investment in economic growth, as the Leader of the Government is aware, and that results in a decrease in revenues to the government and an increase in transfer payments for unemployment insurance, and that sort of thing. That results in an increase in the deficit.

The Leader of the Government is aware that business capital investment is one area where it is extremely important that there be some buoyancy at this stage if the incipient recovery is to proceed at all. Rising interest rates will have a deleterious effect on business capital investment.

In view of these worrisome signs, and in view of the forecasts about declining business capital investment, from the government's own Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, from the most recent report of Statistics Canada, and from the Conference Board of Canada, all of which say that business capital investment in Canada will decline, is the government giving any consideration to measures that might have the effect of reversing this trend and providing a real impetus to business capital investment in Canada?

In particular, is the government giving any consideration to restoring capital cost allowances to the levels they were at prior to the infamous MacEachen budget of November 1981? Has the Minister of Finance had an opportunity to consider the representations made by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association two months ago calling for just such an initiative on the part of the government?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what Senator Murray is now doing, of course, is pointing out how complex the situation is in terms of all the factors that go into interest rates and the ramifications for economic activity which flow from those. We do not disagree on that.

I expect he also realizes that one of the suggestions he has made now, about taking action on a single item, such as an increase in depreciation of capital cost also has a direct effect—and could have a significant effect—on the revenues we have just been talking about. That, too, is a complicating factor in this matter.

The government continues to have a responsible and balanced approach to its attempts to keep the level of financial and economic activity in Canada as high as possible, and all these competitive factors, including the cost of financing, are part of it. I do not think we should get into a discussion now over which action is most appropriate for dealing with the situation. All the complexities and factors involved have to be taken into account. I think the Minister of Finance, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and others involved are giving these matters consideration.

● (1430)

Senator Murray: As a result of a survey by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association of its members, they estimate that the manufacturing sector alone will forgo over $1.8 billion in investment because of what the association calls—and, I believe, accurately—the regressive changes in capital cost allowances. That is, $1.8 billion in the period 1982 to 1985.

I have one final question on this other matter of increasing interest rates. It arises from comments attributed to the Governor of the Bank of Canada this morning at what, I presume, was a press "scrum" after he had testified before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the other place. The Governor of the Bank of Canada is quoted as saying that one of the chief reasons for increasing interest rates in this country is that Canadian workers are obtaining higher wage increases than workers in the United States.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government to obtain from his colleague, the Minister of Finance, a statement as to whether the government agrees with that assertion by the Governor of the Bank of Canada. At the same time, I would ask the minister to place on record the comparative statistics on increases in real incomes in the United States and in Canada. My impression is that the real incomes of Canadian working men and women dropped in 1982 and 1983, whereas they increased in the United States in 1983. I think it extremely important that we receive a clarification from the Minister of Finance—who continues to say that he fully supports the Governor of the Bank of Canada—on whether he supports that rather extraordinary assertion on the part of Mr. Bouey.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can give the undertaking that I will attempt to obtain such a declaration. Of course, I shall have to obtain a copy of the governor's statements, along with his explanation of what he said and why he said it. One of the obvious things we must consider in all that comes out of this is that over the last decade or so there have been different time-frames when certain economic activities have been rising or falling on this side of the border and south of the border. On that basis, Senator Murray's comparison is not valid.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When my honourable friend is asking his colleague to answer the last question, I wonder if he would put another one, to him. It seems to me that the essential debate here is between those who believe that the Canadian dollar should be maintained at its present valuation, or something close to it, and those who believe that maintaining such a standard is not necessary and that, therefore, we could have a more flexible policy on interest rates.

The argument put forward is that if you do not maintain the value of the Canadian dollar, it will result in an increase in inflationary pressures in the country because of what it does to the cost of imported materials, et cetera. The argument on the other hand is that the increase in the rate of interest perhaps will also increase inflation, because of its working through the economy, and will cut off economic growth. There is a trade-off here between the two.

I am quite certain that the Bank of Canada had a study which indicated the figures it has assembled with respect to this trade-off and which is the best course to follow. I would not be surprised if the Department of Finance had exactly the same kind of study in its possession.

Would the minister, through his colleague, inquire of the Governor of the Bank of Canada whether they will give us these studies which indicate the values of the trade-off between the Canadian dollar and the interest rate with respect to its overall effect on the Canadian economy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will make some inquiries to find out what kind of "studies" have been made, as that word relates to the question. I say that because some comments may have been put together among the senior officers of the Bank of Canada, who are charged with this, or of the Department of Finance. Those, in many cases, are communications between themselves. If some studies have been made outside of that and are, indeed, more than an assessment of the situation by the various officers and can be made public, that is a different matter, and I will make that inquiry.

Senator Roblin: I hope my friend is not limiting the scope of his inquiry too much. We understand that the Minister of Finance is ultimately responsible for what the Governor of the Bank of Canada does.

We are dealing here with probably the most critical economic determination in the policy position of the government at the present time: the conflict between interest rates and the price of the Canadian dollar.

In order to examine the policy of the government and to understand the reasons why they are doing what they are doing and, hopefully, to approve of what they are doing, we have to have the facts as to their scenario respecting the trade-off between the Canadian dollar and interest rates. I think we are entitled to get that information without qualification.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if it is a matter of fact and not a matter of opinion, perhaps that is correct, but I want to make it clear to Senator Roblin that there could be matters of opinion of the various people responsible for giving advice to the Minister of Finance and to the government. I was not giving an undertaking that I would attempt to give those matters of opinion. If he is talking of matters of fact, that is something different.

Senator Roblin: I am asking my honourable friend to justify what is going on now. I am asking him to justify the support of the government to the Governor of the Bank of Canada whose policy is to hold the Canadian dollar relatively steady, as opposed to some other policy that might be followed. I want him to justify that policy and to give us the assumptions on which it is based.

Senator Olson: I can do that, but I want it to be clear—and I suppose it is already—that, if there is confidential advice in communiqués passed between the various officers who are responsible for that, I am not giving him an undertaking to try to obtain the opinions and recommendations expressed in those documents.

Senator Roblin: I do not want that; I want the justification and the rationale. I want my honourable friend's assurance he will give us that.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

PROPOSED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the federal government's commitment to saving the aircraft industry, I would ask the minister of state responsible for the Canada Development Investment Corporation, who very recently so generously shifted the $1.3 billion debt of Canadair to the taxpayers, whether he will exercise the same generosity or, at least, the minimum of fairness and equity by relieving The de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, Limited of its burdensome debt of $272 million.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My God, not more!

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, with respect to the first part of Senator Haidasz' question, let me say that the obligations in Canadair were always obligations of the Government of Canada. Nothing has been shifted to the government that it previously did not have. However, my proposal to Parliament is that the obligations, namely, $1.350 billion, be lifted from Canadair. In that case, of course, the Government of Canada continues as the primary debtor of that sum.

● (1440)

With respect to the matter of de Havilland, the financing for de Havilland, beyond that which is contained in the supplementary estimates, will be reviewed by cabinet shortly, and thereafter I expect I shall be in a position to discuss the de Havilland situation on a longer term basis.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. Would the minister give the Senate some assurance this afternoon of the effectiveness of his monitoring of the financial performance and the performance commitments of these companies?

Senator Austin: Senator Haidasz, that is a rather broad, sweeping question. I would be happier if you would ask me something more specific. However, I have provided Parliament with detailed appraisals of Canadair, which are in the form of documents, including a report given to the House of Commons Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee within the last week. If you have not yet received a copy of that material, I shall be glad to direct it to you.

With respect to de Havilland, I have said that we are preparing the material in detail, and sometime during the month of April I shall be releasing the annual report of CDIC, together with annual reports of its subsidiary corporations, both on a consolidated and on a separate basis. That information with respect to de Havilland in particular, therefore, will be available at that time and, I might add, for the first time. In the meantime, the analytical work on the marketing of de Havilland products and on the costs of its operation is being completed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask a supplementary question with respect to the amount of the write-off, which I believe is $1.350 billion with respect to Canadair. I want to ask the minister how he proposes to deal with that. The supplementary estimates that we looked at the other day provide a sum of $340 million of fresh money for Canadair and, at that time, a statement was made with respect to what was intended to be done about the sunk costs of $1.350 billion. If there ever was a telling expression, it has to be the expression "sunk costs" in connection with this enterprise. I would like the minister to tell us how he proposes to deal with Parliament in connection with this transfer of debt from that corporation to the broad backs of the taxpayers.

Senator Austin: The sum provided to Canadair in the supplementary estimates was $310 million. The answer to the balance of Senator Roblin's question is that the Minister of Finance is the minister responsible for dealing with that particular debt, and his decisions with respect to its settlement have not been communicated to me.

Senator Roblin: Would it be true to say that he is fudging the issue? Would it be true to say that he now proposes to transfer the debt from the new Canadair to the old shell; that it will remain in the old shell until the election is safely over and whoever wins that election will then have the responsibility of deciding what to do with it? Is that an accurate description of the state of affairs?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I would deny that the Minister of Finance is in any way creating fudge, conceptually or physically, with respect to Canadair. In fact, there has been more clarity with respect to the management of Canadair's financial affairs since CDIC took charge than there has probably been in the management of any other crown corporation or private corporation. I believe the disclosures with respect to Canadair have been far beyond the disclosure requirements of the Ontario Securities Commission.

The Minister of Finance is considering the question of the Canadair debt and the way in which it will be discharged by the Government of Canada. He will deal with it in due course and probably, as I said in the Senate National Finance Committee, as the various debt amounts come due.

This is one aspect of fascination in Senator Roblin's question. It seems to me that it certainly shows the skill with which he may have administered the affairs of the province of Manitoba, and perhaps we have something more to learn in that regard from him.

Senator Roblin: I would be very surprised indeed if the minister had anything to learn from me.

HON. HAZEN ARGUE, P.C.

POSSIBLE CANDIDACY FOR LEADERSHIP OF LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. We have all been intrigued in recent days by the speculation emanating from the minister's political associates, if not from himself, that he will be seeking the national leadership of the Liberal Party.

In view of the fact that most of the honourable senators on the Liberal side are already scrambling with unseemly haste to climb aboard one or other of the bandwagons, is it not the view of the minister that the critical path that his strategists have no doubt devised for his run for the leadership ought to be foreshortened, and, in order to have some chance of obtaining the support of the one or two uncommitted senators that are left, perhaps he should share with us now his decision on this matter and, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has suggested, try at least for some moral support from this side of the house. Perhaps the minister would share with us now his thinking on this subject.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Or "immoral" support.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, that was a very interesting comment from Senator Murray, since he has had such a long, successful and distinguished career, in many aspects, within his own party. I am sure that any advice he might give me, or anyone else, would be worthy of consideration.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

DROUGHT IN THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES—ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to Senator Asselin's question of March 13, 1984, concerning Canadian humanitarian assistance to the drought victims in Africa. This is a rather long answer and, if it is agreeable to members of the opposition, perhaps it could be taken as read.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am sure that the honourable senators on this side of the house would be agreeable to that, but perhaps the Leader of the Government would care to mention if this aid is in cash or in food contributions.

Senator Olson: I can say that the funds will be used primarily for food aid, but in some cases it will also help to provide such things as clean drinking water and some basic medical care that is required. These amounts, therefore, will not be devoted entirely to food. However, I do not have an answer with respect to the split between supplies and other costs, such as transportation, that are also included.

On March 8, the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that Canada will contribute an additional $4,490,000 in humanitarian assistance for victims of what might well become the most serious famine in African history. The funds will be used primarily for food aid, but will also help to provide clean drinking water and basic health care.

This emergency assistance will be made available through the International Humanitarian Assistance Programme of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) and will be administered by the League of Red Cross Societies ($3 million) and three non-governmental organizations: the Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace ($925,000), the Canadian Council of Churches ($455,000) and the Lutheran World Federation ($110,000).

In recent months the food supply in many African countries has seriously deteriorated. A special action group set up jointly by the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations and the World Food Programme said last summer that an imminent crisis could produce grave economic distress and severe food shortages, affecting 150 million people in 22 African countries. Since the alert was issued, the crisis has deepened. The number of affected countries has risen to 24. Thousands have succumbed to starvation, and even more have died of diseases associated with low levels of nutrition.

Factors contributing to the crisis are the prolonged drought, insect-infested crops and animal disease. The "harmattan", or dry wind, has continued to fan bush fires in a number of coastal West African countries. A population growth rate for Africa of 3.2 per cent per annum exerts pressures on limited arable land. Civil strife in some countries has dislocated many people, creating refugees and general insecurity. In addition, the global recession hit Africa particularly severely, weakening the ability of governments in the region to deal with disaster.

Canada has already provided $75 million in food aid during the past year to governments of the most seriously affected countries, and $15 million, earmarked for the drought victims of Africa, to the International Emergency Food Reserve administered by the World Food Programme. In addition, the major international humanitarian institutions have launched broad-based emergency relief programs requiring $1.3 billion.

As the delivery of assistance is complicated by the poor transportation and distribution networks, humanitarian institutions are co-operating in an effort to overcome these difficulties.

While helping to abate immediate distress, Canada is also providing long-term assistance to African economies to increase their agricultural production and their ability to cope with food shortages.

CRIMINAL CODE

SECTIONS 150 and 153—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Nurgitz on February 21 last concerning the wording of sections 150 and 153 of the Criminal Code of Canada. At that time, Senator Nurgitz suggested that there might be a loophole in the Criminal Code whereby adoptive fathers can escape criminal prosecution for having sexual intercourse with their adopted daughters.

The question has arisen because of a judgment of a court in Manitoba. That decision is under appeal and it would be inappropriate for us to comment on the facts of the case or the merits of that decision.

For your information, however, we can advise that the issue in the case turns on the meaning of the terms employed in subsection 153(1) of the Criminal Code. It is an offence for a male person to have sexual intercourse with any person who is his stepdaughter, foster daughter or female ward. There is no specific reference to adoptive daughters in the enactment and the question is whether such a relationship falls within the meaning of the words used in the section. Blood relationships are covered separately under the incest offence defined in section 150.

While the resolution of the particular case in question must await the decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, I would like to advise that the report of the National Study on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youths, under the chairmanship of Professor Robin Badgley of the University of Toronto, will be received by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Health and Welfare within the next two months. That report is expected to provide the most comprehensive appraisal of the protection afforded children from sexual offences by the Criminal Code.

I might add that the government has in recent years proposed amendments to the Criminal Code to deal specifically with the problem of the sexual exploitation of children by adults. Those proposals will be reconsidered by the Department of Justice with the aid of the report of the Badgley committee when it is received.

JUSTICE

WRONGFUL IMPRISONMENT—CIVIL LIABILITY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question first asked by Senator Nurgitz on November 17 last concerning the Donald Marshall case. An answer was received, but it arrived after the prorogation of Parliament and the question died on the order paper. I have now received a shorter but updated answer.

While the Nova Scotia Supreme Court identified Mr. Marshall's own conduct as a contributing factor in his wrongful conviction for the murder of Sandy Seale, the fact remains that a miscarriage of justice occurred and Donald Marshall served 11 years in prison for an offence he did not commit. The Minister of Justice has for some months been trying to persuade the Government of Nova Scotia to face and resolve the concerns that many Canadians have regarding Donald Marshall's unfortunate position. While urging action, the minister felt constrained to permit provincial authorities, under whose supervision and authority the Marshall case was investigated and prosecuted, to take the action that would fulfil their proper responsibility.

It is therefore with some real satisfaction that the minister noted the decision of the Nova Scotia government to appoint Mr. Justice Alex Campbell, of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island, to examine and assess the issue of compensation to Donald Marshall. The minister trusts that this step will lead to an appropriate redress of his present unsatisfactory situation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Special Senate Committee on National Defence have power to sit at 4 o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesday next, March 28, 1984, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, for the record, this is the motion that earlier today I undertook to present on behalf of Senator Lafond's committee, because of necessary adjustments to our schedule next week.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 27, 1984, at 8 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 346)

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE
SECOND REPORTREPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1984

March 22, 1984

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1984, were referred, does, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, March 6, 1984, report as follows:

Your Committee held two meetings with the following witnesses:

The Honourable Jacob Austin, P.C.
Minister of State for Social Development

Mr. G. Bennett
President and Chief Executive Officer, Canadair Limited

From the Treasury Board:

Mr. J. L. Manion
Secretary

Mr. Herman Hansen
Assistant Secretary, Social Development, Program Branch

Mr. Hugh J. Mullington
Assistant Secretary, Crown Corporations, Program Branch

Supplementary Estimates (C) totalling $2.4 billion is the third and final supplementary for the fiscal year 1983-84. The total 1983-84 estimates tabled to date are $92.7 billion. With the lapse of various funds, the total expenditures for 1983-84 are not expected to exceed $90.7 billion. Of the $2.4 billion contained in these supplementary estimates, $1.1 billion represent the net adjustment to items with a statutory authority. These payments are non-discretionary in nature. The remaining $1.3 billion represent new spending authorities that Parliament is being asked to approve.

Supplementary Estimates (C) provide a list of 32 one dollar items, with explanatory notes (attached as Appendix A). The Committee notes with approval that none of these one dollar items has been used to create a new spending authority and that reasonable information has been provided as to the reasons for the items. However, the Committee continues to object to the use of one dollar votes as a device for transferring unspent funds to another vote.

The Committee noted with concern that Treasury Board officials were unable to provide any answers regarding the use of the $170 million allocated "for special purposes" to the Canada Post Corporation. This amount is additional to $300 million representing the 1983-84 deficit.

The Committee devoted an afternoon hearing to reviewing material relating to Canadair and decided to hold an additional in camera session to examine more sensitive material. The Committee also expressed an interest to include the future reorganization and funding of de Havilland in such a session. While recognizing that the approach adopted by the government for reorganizing the structure of Canadair and its production schedule appears to be the right one, the Committee noted that the company's sales projections for 1984 and future years involve considerable uncertainty. The president of the company, Mr. Bennett, provided a rough estimate of an opening balance sheet and a sales and earnings forecast, both of which are attached as appendices B and C to this report. The Committee was satisfied that cost projections were reasonably conservative, but noted that they did not include provision for any major redesign of the Challenger, should one be necessary to meet changing competition.

The supporting material submitted to the Committee by Senator Austin indicated that

"any short-term cash requirements will be met pursuant to conventional banking arrangements between New Canadair and its bankers, without the need for further government guarantees." (p. 17: Canadair Update: A report to Parliament from Canada Development Investment Corporation; March, 1984)

The main concern of the Committee, which will be pursued in the in camera session is to ensure that no decision to commit additional monies to the Challenger program, which would be necessary if any major redesign of the aircraft were undertaken to meet new competition, should be entered into without prior disclosure to Parliament and parliamentary approval for the decision in advance.

In the Committee's judgement, a major cause for the lack of control which developed within Canadair was the mixture of public servants and businessmen on the board, because the businessmen tended to treat the public servants as speaking for the sole shareholder, namely the government of Canada. The Committee goes so far as to recommend that the boards of crown corporations engaged in commercial enterprise should, for the most part, not include public servants; government directions can be conveyed in other ways. Specifically, in the case of Canadair, the Committee suggests that the board of directors should be clearly informed of its concern that any future recommendation which might be made for the expenditure of funds needing additional government loan guarantees should receive parliamentary approval in advance of any decision to undertake a new program which required such funds.

Respectfully submitted,

C. WILLIAM DOODY,

Chairman.

APPENDIX II

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATIONS

Category C—To establish loan guaranteesAgriculture

Vote 5c—Authority is requested to guarantee a loan in an amount up to $5.5 million to the Co-operative Implements Limited.

Explanation—This loan guarantee of $5.5 million is part of a financial agreement entered into with the Co-operative Implements Limited, the Canada Co-operative Credit Society, the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Federal Government. The purpose of this agreement is to provide financial assistance to the Co-operative Implements Limited. The Federal Government's 50% share is comprised of a loan guarantee of $5.5 million and the making of recoverable contributions which total $16 million.

Bill C-96, proclaimed on November 30, 1983, amended the Financial Administration Act and now provides authority under subsection 22(2) to establish loan guarantees by means of an Appropriation Act.

Transport

Vote 39c—Authority is requested to guarantee loans and other financial arrangements totalling $205 million entered into by Ridley Terminals Inc. and to allow for the rollover of these guarantees up to March 31, 1989.

Explanation—Ridley Terminals Inc. is a joint venture between Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd and Canada Ports Corporation for the purpose of providing coal transshipment facilities at Ridley Island, B.C., the existence of which is essential for the private development of north-eastern B.C. coal deposits for export markets. Interim financing from private sources has been made available on the strength of assurances provided by the Minister of Transport that Parliamentary approval would be sought to guarantee loans up to $205 million.

Bill C-96, proclaimed on November 30, 1983, amended the Financial Administration Act and now provides authority under subsection 22(2) to establish loan guarantees by means of an Appropriation Act.

Category D—To authorize increases in the drawing authority for Revolving FundsCommunications

Vote 2c—Authority is requested to increase the drawing authority of the Government Telecommunications Agency Revolving Fund from $12 million to $15 million.

Explanation—The Revolving Fund was included under the Adjustment of Accounts Act (1980). Section 33 of that Act includes authority to amend certain sections of the Act through an Appropriation Act, including Section 23 which deals with the authority for making payments out of the Revolving Fund and with the amount of the draw-down authority.

This proposed increase in the drawing authority is required to provide the Revolving Fund with sufficient working capital to finance 35 days of operations thus reducing the risk of incurring surcharges by the telecommunications carriers for the late payments of invoices.

Transport

Vote 6c—Authority is requested to increase the drawing authority of the Stores Revolving Fund from $35.7 million to $43.7 million.

Explanation—The Revolving Fund was included under the Adjustment of Accounts Act (1980). Section 33 of that Act includes authority to amend certain sections of the Act through an Appropriation Act, including Section 30 which deals with the authority for making payments out of the Revolving Fund and with the amount of the draw-down authority.

The proposed increase in the drawing authority is required to provide for the cost of replacement equipment related mainly to the air and marine operations, to be purchased over the next three years.

Category E—MiscellaneousExternal Affairs—Canadian International Development Agency

Vote L38c—Authority is requested for approval of the issue of non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes of up to $14 million for contributions to international financial institutions.

Explanation—The demand notes of $14 million will be used to provide for Canada's third and last installment as financial assistance to the International Fund for Agricultural Development in developing countries. The first two installments of $14 million each were made in March, 1982 and mid-July, 1983. The issue of the three notes was agreed to under the First Replenishment in 1981-82.

This third note has been issued in accordance with the International Development (Financial Institutions) Continuing Assistance Act. There is no immediate cash requirement. The notes will be encashed over the next few years as required.

ANNEX C

Labour—Canada Post Corporation

Vote 7c—To report the actual excess of operating and income charges over revenues for the Corporation for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983

Explanation—The Corporation received advances from the Minister of Finance during 1982-83 to offset revenue shortfalls in accordance with Section 29(1) of the Canada Post Corporation Act. Section 29(3) of the Act provides that the excess of advances over revenues are to be included as a "deficit appropriation item" in "the next Estimates laid before Parliament thereafter". Since the advances have already been reported as expenditures of the Government in the 1982-83 fiscal year, they cannot be voted as expenditures in 1983-84. Accordingly, in order to conform with the intent of the Act, a $1 voted item has been included in these Supplementaries to inform Parliament of the actual amount of the Corporation's deficit for 1982-83. To avoid reporting forecasts for the Corporation's deficit to Parliament after the fact, these Supplementaries also include a statutory item of $300 million as being the estimate of the Corporation's deficit for 1983-84. The actual 1983-84 deficit will be reported as a $1 item in 1984-85 Supplementary Estimates, again in accordance with Section 29(3) of the Act.

Tuesday, March 27, 1984

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE RIGHT HONOURABLE BORA LASKIN, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my sad duty to pay tribute to the memory of the Right Honourable Bora Laskin who passed away last night. Bora Laskin was a brilliant legal scholar and libertarian, as well as being Canada's pre-eminent jurist. When he was named to the Supreme Court in 1970, he was already considered to possess one of Canada's outstanding legal minds. Three years later he was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. In his ten years in that post, Bora Laskin set a new course for the court. He brought with him a humanistic viewpoint, hard work and a special expertise in constitutional law.

After a decade as Chief Justice, Bora Laskin was considered by many to be one of the most respected jurists in the history of Canada. Judgments from Bora Laskin's decade as Chief Justice will be considered landmarks and will set precedents for years to come. He was never afraid to voice his opinion, even if it ran counter to that of the majority, and, indeed, his dissenting opinion in the Murdock case in 1974 is considered as having formed the basis for more equitable matrimonial laws in almost every Canadian province.

Canada will miss his leadership, his intellect, his dedication and his honesty. He was a great Canadian.

On behalf of the government, I should like to offer our most sincere condolences to his wife and family.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, all judges judge, but not all have judgment. It must be said of Bora Laskin that he possessed this quality to a degree rarely accorded by Divine Providence. His dissenting opinions, as mentioned by the Leader of the Government—and they were frequent—were always brilliantly defended. He could cut through the cant and crust of the law, making clear some of its most complex tenets.

He was a born teacher: sensitive, dynamic, inquisitive and totally dedicated to making more readily understandable to everyone that which was the focus of his life—the law.

Probably due to his background he was naturally inclined to take up unpopular causes. As a labour arbitrator, he was looked upon as the defender of the beleaguered worker. As a teacher, he was considered something of a free-wheeling radical and a tough-minded civil libertarian. These things he may well have been, but he was also fiercely independent. He was an individualist who, at times, appeared to operate on the fringes of what was deemed acceptable by a profession steeped in tradition and somewhat slow to change.

[Translation]

Bora Laskin had an exceptional legal career, first as a law professor and researcher. However, it is as a judge that he made his mark.

He was a jurist of his time, a liberal, an innovator—open to change.

Wherever his gifts took him, he remained aware of his origins and he always sought to protect the rights of the humble.

Speaking personally, as a lawyer who had to plead before him and as Minister of Justice who had to take decisions of interest to the judiciary, my dealings with him were most gratifying.

His death is a great loss, because men like him are rather scarce.

To his wife and children, I extend our deepest sympathy on behalf of the official opposition.

[English]

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I share with the country the tremendous sadness at the death of Bora Laskin, who rose to the heights of his profession to become Chief Justice of Canada and the exponent of the living law. He was the best legal mind in Ottawa, and we can all say he was a good man, a great Canadian, a man of wisdom and humanity. He had a passion for justice; not for popularity. As a man, he accomplished many things because he had the courage to be himself.

Bora Laskin received his B. A. in 1933 from the University of Toronto; his Master's degree in 1935; and his law degree in 1936. He obtained his Master's in law from Harvard in 1937.

After eight years in university, Laskin suddenly found himself looking for work, but he could not get it practising law. Doors in the large law firms were closed to him. It took us politicians to open those doors for him and for others. He went to university to teach, and we are fortunate he did.

I was a member of the committee that, in November 1973, recommended him for the acceptance of the prestigious Human Relations Award, given each year by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. He spoke to the council after receiving the award and he had this to say:

There is the over-arching fact that we, no less than the honorees of years past and those who will come after us, are temporarily the focus of social convictions. We are merely points of emphasis of a democratic humanism that we see as a fulfillment of public duty and private responsibility. To the extent to which the award is a personal tribute, I accept it representatively and proudly as a Canadian citizen of Jewish faith, whose traditions and ethics find confirmation in the values that support our Constitution and public arrangements. I am here in a personal capacity and not as a judge. To use the words of another judge of the Jewish faith who was once my teacher, the late Felix Frankfurter:

Judges, in their official capacity, are neither Jew nor Gentile, neither Catholic nor agnostic.

This sense, nay, this obligation of official detachment springs ultimately from a social philosophy that sees the individual, whether alone, or as a member of a group, as a subject of undifferentiating respect, whatever his or her religion, his or her belief, his or her colour.

Vibrant and enthusiastic, a sound mind in an ailing body, his mind was a priceless possession of this country. His standards of fearlessness and intellect gave him a unique position in the trust of Canada. His death deprives all of us. He will be missed. I extend sympathy to his wife and family.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to add another dimension to our remembrance of Chief Justice Bora Laskin. Bora Laskin was my professor at the University of Toronto Law School in the late 1940s and also at Osgoode Hall Law School, and I learned a great deal from him. The last time I appeared before the Supreme Court of Canada, when he was presiding, was a little over a year ago, and he taught me a few lessons then, too. But I remember him best as a teacher, as a counsellor and as a friend. The unique thing about Chief Justice Laskin—our beloved Bora—was that the role he played in my life was not unique; he played this teaching, avuncular, friendly role with legions of law students and lawyers.

On my own and on their behalf, I want to say that I am sorry he is no longer with us.

● (2010)

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, in view of the excellent tributes that have been paid to the late Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, particularly those by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition, I shall not attempt to add anything to the words of praise that have already been written into our record. However, I do want to point out that, a few years ago, I had the honour of bestowing upon the Honourable Bora Laskin a Doctorate of Laws from Dalhousie University. On that occasion I admired his graciousness, and one could even say humility, and, thereafter, the friendliness with which he always treated me and the interest that he took, both before and after that occasion, in the students of Dalhousie University, particularly those in the law school of our university. Whenever he came to Halifax, he was exceedingly popular in student seminars and, even when he was the Chief Justice of Canada, he always had time to meet with and discuss things with students.

[Senator Croll.]

I remember him as a warm human being, a person who embodied all the qualities that have been attributed to him by the Honourable Senator Olson and the Honourable Senator Flynn. He was a truly great scholar of the law. He was one of the greatest legal scholars not only in and around Ottawa but in an international context as well. He was an innovator; completely courageous and not the least bit concerned with popularity, and, because of that, he was the kind of person whom Canada can be proud to have had as its Chief Justice.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I wish to add a few words to the tribute that Senator Frith has paid, because he and I had similar experiences with the late Chief Justice of Canada.

Bora Laskin came to Osgoode Hall at the end of the Second World War, just as I and many others came out of the forces and began our course in the study of law at Osgoode Hall. The system which operated at Osgoode Hall in those days was one of three years of study, with half of your time, namely the afternoons, being spent as an articling student in an office and the other half, namely the mornings, being spent studying at Osgoode Hall.

Cecil Wright and Bora Laskin came to Osgoode Hall with the avowed purpose of revolutionizing the legal educational system in the Province of Ontario. They succeeded in a measure which perhaps even they had not anticipated so that, thereafter, a legal education required a university degree as well as completion of the Bar Admission Course. They then went to the University of Toronto to follow through on that campaign.

Bora Laskin taught me constitutional law and labour law. In spite of my mediocrity as a student, he managed to make me understand some of the complications, the niceties, of those fields of law.

Honourable senators, in my judgment, Bora Laskin was a remarkable judge, a remarkable lawyer, a remarkable teacher and a remarkable human being. He was my teacher and a warm-hearted friend. My condolences go forward to his wife, to his family, and to his many students and believers in his wisdom and integrity.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Honourable Maurice Riel, Speaker of the Senate, I sent the following message to Mrs. Laskin today:

On behalf of the Senate of Canada, please accept sincere condolences at the passing of your husband.

Chief Justice Laskin made an enormous contribution to Canada. Canadians learned to love and respect him for his scholarship, leadership and wisdom in our nation's legal and constitutional history.

We know all Canadians share with you pride for his life and sorrow at his death.

Honourable senators, I should like to inform you that there will be a lying-in-state ceremony for the late Chief Justice Bora Laskin tomorrow, Wednesday, March 28, 1984, at the Supreme Court of Canada between 9:00 and 9:30 a.m. The honourable senators are invited to join the Prime Minister and other high dignitaries and leaders of state for the lying-in-state of the remains of the late Chief Justice Bora Laskin, at which condolences will be offered to representatives of his family.

Honourable senators, I would ask you to rise for a moment of silence.

Honourable senators then stood in silent tribute.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 28, 1984, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, I will explain if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Thursday last, when I moved the adjournment of the Senate until 8 o'clock this evening, I mentioned that at a meeting of committee chairmen and others the consensus had been that it would generally be desirable to return to our long standing schedule; that is, sitting on Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock, and on Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock. As I said last week, the reason we felt it better to sit at 4 o'clock this Wednesday, as opposed to 2 o'clock, was that several committees had planned meetings for 2 o'clock in the thought that the Senate would not be sitting at all on Wednesday.

As a footnote, if the appropriation bill regarding the supplementary estimates (C) and Bill C-28 receive second and third readings by tomorrow afternoon, then we hope to have Royal Assent tomorrow afternoon as opposed to Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE ESTIMATES 1983-84

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (C), which was presented on Thursday, March 22, 1984.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a few words on the supplementary estimates (C) which were laid before this house on Tuesday last. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance studied them and reported to this chamber on Thursday last.

The committee held two meetings in the process of examining these estimates. The first was with the Honourable Jack Austin, P.C., our colleague and Minister of State for Social Development, and Mr. G. Bennett, the President and Chief Executive Officer of Canadair Ltd.

The second meeting was held with Treasury Board officials: Mr. J. L. Manion, Mr. Hansen and Mr. Mullington. Mr. Mullington has the responsibility for supervising crown corporations.

These supplementary estimates total $2.4 billion; they are the third and final supplementary estimates for the fiscal year 1983-84. The total for the year tabled to date is $92.7 billion. Some of those funds will not be used, and the saving through the lapse of those funds will reduce the total expenditure to approximately $91 billion.

The $2.4 billion contained in these supplementary estimates includes $1.4 billion net adjustments to items with a statutory authority. Those are not discretionary, and so there is no room to manoeuvre with them; they are locked-in expenditures.

The remaining $1.3 billion represents new spending authority that Parliament has been asked to approve. Included in these supplementary estimates are 32 $1 items. The members of the committee once again decry the use of these $1 votes. We realize that it is a convenience for the bureaucrats to transfer funds from one vote to another. Their argument, of course, is that those moneys have already been voted by Parliament and that they are simply moving unused funds from one subhead to another to avoid the double trouble of having to go back to Parliament to ask it to vote again for moneys which have lapsed under the original subhead under which they were voted. The flaw in this, of course, is that the moneys are not being used for the purpose for which they were voted, but are being used for a different purpose through the strategy of the $1 vote. That is really not respecting the parliamentary process.

We should note on the positive side of the $1 votes, however, that none of these has been used, at least this time, to create new spending authority. Reasonable information has been provided for the purposes of the votes and we anticipate we will be seeing more of them. Treasury Board officials feel that it is a reasonable management tool, and, although the committee disagrees, we have not been able to convince Treasury Board that our reasoning is sound.

An interesting item in this set of supplementary estimates is the $170 million vote allocated to the Canada Post Corporation. That amount is in addition to $300 million represented in the 1983-84 deficit. We were unable to receive any information on the $170 million, other than that $50 million was voted from the Department of Communications and represented, at least in part, a subsidy paid to the Canada Post Corporation for the distribution of Canadian cultural material through the mails. We were unable to get a definition of "cultural material". We were also unable to obtain a satisfactory explanation as to the use of the remaining money voted to the Post Office. This is a matter of some concern to the committee, and Treasury Board officials have been asked to provide that information to us.

The major items in this set of supplementary estimates—at least those which caused the greatest concern to the committee—are the moneys voted for Canadair and de Havilland. The committee devoted an afternoon to reviewing material relating to Canadair, and found that Senator Austin and Mr. Bennett were willing to provide us with quite a substantial amount of information. However, the material that supports the projections of the company for the coming years was not available to us as it was held to be of a commercial nature and not for public distribution. The rationale for supplying these funds to Canadair—these hundreds of millions of dollars of funds—is based on the assumption that the company will be making money once this debt load is taken off its back. We can only accept that at its face value since no supporting figures were provided, other than those plucked out of the air as far as we were concerned. The 15 planes sold per year to make the company break even, or to make a profit, is an arbitrary number from where we sit, and we have not been privy to the supporting documentation.

In all fairness, the minister and Mr. Bennett agreed to meet with the members of the committee in camera to provide further information—not all the information that is available, but further information. The members of the committee invited the minister and his officials to meet with them and we look forward to that session.

I might add that the president of the company, Mr. Bennett, provided a rough estimate of an opening balance sheet and sales and earnings forecasts, both of which are available and, indeed, have been tabled with the report. As honourable senators can see, these are, indeed, very rough forecasts, and, once again, no supporting documentation is available.

● (2040)

The committee was satisfied that cost projections were reasonably conservative, but noted that they did not include provision for any major redesign of the Challenger should one be necessary to meet changing competition. It would appear that this is looming on the horizon.

The supporting material submitted to the committee by Senator Austin indicated that:

any short-term cash requirements will be met pursuant to conventional banking arrangements between New Canadair and its bankers, without the need for further government guarantees.

This New Canadair, of course, is the new operating company as distinct from the old or original company which still carries the debt load and which will have that function and, I assume, that function only; in other words, it will be a vehicle through which government will retire the huge debt of this company as it comes due.

The main concern of the committee then, and one which we will pursue in the in camera session, is to ensure that no further funds will be committed to the Challenger program without first having the approval of Parliament. We should have complete disclosure to Parliament before the decision is made to pump more money into that huge and expensive program. We still do not know what upper limit on government spending is anticipated for the Canadair programs. We have to assume that there must be a limit somewhere, but to date no figure has been indicated, not even a ball-park one.

There is one other point worthy of note and that is the restructuring of the board of Canadair. Public servants are no longer members of that board. Business people are expected to make decisions affecting the company in the future, and we hope that will go some way towards correcting some of the problems that have been apparent. We must sympathize with the public servants who were appointed to this board—and, indeed, with those appointed to all crown boards. A clear conflict is apparent. One can only wonder how they could have been expected to perform their duties as directors under the circumstances in which they found themselves. I had hoped that public servants would no longer be associated with these crown corporations, but I note that this is not to be. I note that in the new CDIC, as described by Senator Austin in his press release of March 20, four deputy ministers have been appointed to that board along with a number of appointees from the private sector.

With regard to the CDIC and further to the supplementary estimates, I note that de Havilland is one of the companies controlled by the overall umbrella of CDIC. In the supplementary estimates, the government has approved CDIC's request for $240 million to allow Dash-8 production to go ahead. Senator Austin, the minister responsible, was not in a position to give the committee any information about de Havilland. I find that this is a most unsatisfactory and unacceptable state of affairs. The sum of $240 million is a substantial chunk of the taxpayers' money that has been committed through this vote to de Havilland, and yet we are unable to get any information.

The responsibility of the minister is to Parliament and, I would think, primarily to this house. However, he does not have the material ready to his satisfaction in order to report. Nevertheless, we are expected to vote the $240 million. Obviously, we have no choice but to do so. However, I must complain about the inability or the refusal of the minister to give us any information about the affairs of this particular company. He has assured us that as he gets his material prepared, he will meet with us, but the minister has also said that he has an outstanding commitment to meet with the House of Commons. I take it that is a prior commitment, but I hope the minister will reconsider and appear before the Senate committee before he meets with the House of Commons committee. However, we will see what happens.

Honourable senators, there are a number of other items in these estimates which are worthy of attention. I will not take the time of the house to go into them now. I simply note the fact that the committee has examined the estimates. We certainly do not approve of them, but we bring them to you for your attention.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, Senator Doody mentioned that the only reason the Post Office could give him for the allocation of the additional $50 million was for cultural purposes. Could he enlarge on that?

Senator Doody: I would certainly like to be able to enlarge on that, but the situation is as I described it. The members of the committee questioned the Treasury Board officials on what this money was to be used for by Canada Post. They were told that $50 million of the $170 million was to be used as a subsidy from the Department of Communications to help pay the costs of what they described as cultural—material which is mail; by whom or to whom we do not know. We know that the taxpayers, through the Department of Communications, pay $50 million to Canada Post to help defray the costs of handling it. What the balance of that $170 million was for, Treasury Board was not in a position to tell us. They undertook to get the information for us. In all fairness to them, most information is forthcoming very quickly but in this particular instance it was not, so we must have caught them off guard or they must have slipped up somewhere along the line. I wish I could provide you with the information, but I cannot.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, one can be left with the impression that the Treasury Board is making recommendations for allocating large sums of money, and yet they cannot substantiate it, which does not make any sense to me.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to what my colleagues have said about these supplementary estimates, because it has been made quite clear to the house that insofar as de Havilland is concerned in particular we are certainly flying blind. We have been asked to provide approximately $250 million, which I consider a substantial sum, without any justification as to why it should be forthcoming. It represents an act of faith on the part of Parliament, and I must say that when I relate that to the history of Canadair I have some concern as to whether that faith is not misplaced, because we are flying blind with respect to Canadair as well. It seems to me that it is not out of place to remind ourselves that we are being asked to put up $310 million for Canadair. That is really not the important point that the government made in connection with this corporation in the course of dealing with these estimates. The important point that they made was that $1.350 billion was to be written off, and I think that point requires more attention than it has received in this chamber up to the present time. I should like to express my views on that subject.

Canadair was run by an American conglomerate, General Dynamics, quite successfully in Canada up to 1976 or 1977 when that experienced American company decided, as it viewed the prospects for the company, that it probably would not be a viable business operation in Canada in the future. That presented a problem. The government responded to that problem by making the assumption—I believe I am safe in saying this—that, while it might be that the General Dynamics firm was not able to make a go of this thing in the future, the government would be able to; it would operate this firm in a business-like and successful manner into the future—a prospect that had not appealed to the original owners. No doubt they were very happy to receive $42 million for handing over their business to the Government of Canada at that time.

Since 1977 until the present time there has been a very unsatisfactory record of performance in connection with the operation of Canadair. One thing that concerns me particularly—although looking from the outside to the inside I may be a little unfair—is that the government used every means it could to conceal from Parliament what was going on. It seems to me that the government went to some pains to make sure that, even though Parliament is supposed to have some input in the financial operations of the government, it should not be told anything about Canadair that would cause concern. In fact, the government went so far as to fudge the financing of this company by saying to them that, when they wanted money, instead of coming to Parliament—as should have been done—the government would extend letters of comfort. Letters of comfort are not parliamentary documents; they do not require the approval of Parliament; they were not presented to Parliament; but they enabled this company to obtain funds it needed and which would not be available to it under any other conceivable circumstance.

It seems to me that it is not unfair to say the government not only concealed from Parliament what was going on in Canadair, but took pains to make sure that it should not find out until such time as this situation could no longer be kept under cover and it was necessary to expose the true extent of the problem so that parliamentarians and the public could know what they were faced with in connection with Canadair.

When the figures were disclosed, it was made evident that, while it cost $46 million to purchase the company, another $2.1 billion of new money had been put into Canadair in order to keep that unfortunate leviathan afloat.

Now the government has come along and, as a footnote to the supplementary estimates that we received, has given us a document called, "Canadair Update: A Report to Parliament from Canada Development Investment Corporation; March 1984." In that document, where they refer to the $310 million more that they are asking for right now, they also advance the proposition that $1.350 billion of old debt owed by this company should be handled in some other way than by the company itself; in effect, it should be removed from the books of the company. In one sense that is a practical decision, because on no conceivable estimate of the future activities of this company is that money to be recaptured. It is sunk costs, and "sunk" with a vengeance; that money is never coming back.

The minister described this as a business decision made for business reasons. At the risk of copying a rather famous character, I would say, "Some business; some reasons." You have $1.350 billion which has been transferred to a shell company. It's a shell game all right. It will be off the books of the New Canadair; it will not be included in any way in their costing; and it has been transferred to a shell company which holds the money for the time being.

What will eventually happen—and I am sure I can say this with a degree of confidence—is that it will be added to the public debt, and from now until the end of time—I think it is fair to say forever; I do not think anyone would contradict me—interest will be payable on that sum. At a rate of 10 per cent, it will amount to $135 million per year forever, and at 12 per cent, it will be $162 million per year forever. That is the effect of transferring this debt from the New Canadair through the old Canadair shell. That shell will remain for the purposes of holding the debt for quite a while, but, ultimately,

I feel sure the government of the country will pick up this debt with the cost to the taxpayer being along the lines I have mentioned.

While we are talking about an additional $310 million this year, we have to face the reality that we are making arrangements so that the interest costs to the government—the taxpayer—will continue at the rate of $135 million from now until the end of time. That factor cannot be lightly overlooked or lightly glossed over as we look at the supplementary estimates.

I thought it interesting to try to justify what the government did, because they are not entirely unreasonable; they have their reasons; and they have their goals when they enter into policies of this sort, and you will see them set out quite candidly and fairly in the report to Parliament presented in March of this year. There are three main reasons why they got into Canadair in the first place, and it is very constructive, I think, to take a look at what happened.

The first reason is that maintaining the existence of Canadair will provide a machinery by which offset contracts could be operated in the Canadian economy. What that means is, if they were buying a lot of aircraft material from some foreign country, they could say, "Look, let's make some of it in Canada to reduce our foreign exchange problems and increase our employment and economic activity. Let's take some of these offsets from the big order we are giving you and make them in some Canadian factory and it will make us all feel a lot better and be good for all concerned." The proposition put forth, apparently, was that Canadair was the only company able to do this kind of thing. Senator Guay and I both know a firm or two in the city of Winnipeg that have been doing offset work of this kind on airframes—since that is what we are talking about in connection with Canadair—who would be very glad to have some of this business. There are other firms in this country who are able to do offset business. Why it should be thought, as it was in 1977, that offset business was a reason for keeping Canadair is something that escapes me. They may have some special capacity that I know naught of; I am willing to admit my ignorance, but I shall be very surprised if no one else in the country can do that.

The second reason for keeping this company going is that it will offset the trade deficit, particularly the trade deficit in manufactured products. That is a pretty good thing to contemplate. We do have a deficit in manufactured products, and we are all anxious to do something about that. What did Canadair do? The principle is right on, but you have to remember that almost all of their sales are made to foreigners. The Canadian content of Canadair aircraft sold abroad is less than 50 per cent; it might be 40 per cent. That is because all of the components as well as the interior of the aircraft are foreign sourced.

When you consider that these sales were made over the years at prices below cost and, in some instances, on outrageous terms, it is obvious that they were nothing but a subsidy to the foreign businesses that bought the aircraft. I think it would be hard to argue that that is, in any realistic sense, a contribution to our trade deficit.

The third reason that we should have kept this company in 1977 was its contribution to the expansion of high technology. I certainly hope there was some contribution to high technology from Canadair in the Canadian industrial structure. I am not very sanguine that it was substantial. After all, 50 per cent of what they put into the aircraft they buy from the United States. The engines and many of the gadgets that go into the planes are all bought there. The airframe is the Canadian contribution.

The problems of the Challenger 600 are well known. There is no technological triumph there. Fortunately, the technological condition of the Challenger 601 is a good deal better, but I suggest that most of the high technology in that aircraft is borrowed. I would be surprised if any substantial portion were made in Canada; but let's assume that it is, because, if it is, it is a good thing.

If you were to take these three reasons that were advanced for keeping this company going in 1977 and subject them to any kind of benefit-cost ratio you cared to dream up, I think you would be hard put to say that it was worth it. You would be hard put to say that this write-off of $1.350 billion is a pill that should be swallowed because of the other benefits that come from this operation.

There were about 6,000 jobs in 1977, when the company was taken over, and about 4,300 jobs now. The cost per job works out at about $474,000.

If you are thinking of high technology, increasing employment and balancing our merchandise trade, you have to ask yourself whether the money was well spent and whether, if you had $1.350 billion to vote for this kind of activity, there could not have been a more substantial and satisfactory way of spending the money. Hindsight is easy, and I am aware of that, but it seems to me that if Parliament had been kept advised of what was going on, when it was going on, our problems would be smaller than they are today and we would have less to complain about.

● (2100)

Now we are told: "That is water under the bridge. Eliminate the $1.350 billion from the balance sheet of the New Canadair; take it out of the price-tag. Do not include any of the cost of that money in calculating the price of your new aircraft, and now we are going to make money—or, at least, if we sell 15 aircraft per year, we shall have an operating profit." That was the statement that was made. I say to that: Why not? If any other company in Canada had its debt lifted from its back; if half of the bankrupt businesses in Canada—and this company is surely bankrupt—had their debts removed from their balance sheets and paid by someone else, I dare say there are a lot of businesses in this country that have run into trouble that would be doing well right now with that sort of scenario. Therefore, if you are going to remove the debt from this company to the extent of interest costs of $135 or $150 million a year, they will surely make money if they sell 15 of these aircraft into the new market today. I would like to believe that.

However, there are some experts who tell us that that may not be true. If you have been following this case, you will see that certain people in the aircraft-financing industry—for instance, Lehman Brothers of New York—have expressed some doubts about the restructuring of the finances. They say it does not change a thing. Also, Tom Barrett, who made a study of Canadair with the Shieldings investigation into the company in 1982—at which time he had some good advice for the government which, of course, it did not take—tells those who ask him that this restructuring still does not make sense. I hope these experts are wrong, but I suspect that we are going to have a little bit of trouble and I suspect that even with this transfer of debt, as I have described it here today, we have not eliminated what could be called a hemorrhage of public resources in keeping this company afloat.

I want to deal with that matter in particular, because in the report of the committee, which you have read, there is a statement about the financial prospects of this company. That report says:

any short-term cash requirements will be met pursuant to conventional banking arrangements between New Canadair and its bankers, without the need for further government guarantees.

And I underline that last phrase, "without the need for further government guarantees." That is right here in the minister's report.

However, he said more than that, and perhaps this also should have been in the report that the committee brought down. The minister said something that is equally, if not more, important. He said that the New Canadair should no longer require annual equity infusions from government to remain in business. That is a pretty big undertaking. He said: "We will not have to go to the government for short-term bank credit." He said: "We will not have to go to the government for new equity money." But the statement is very carefully phrased, because there is another type of money which, perhaps inadvertently, perhaps intentionally, has not been included in this guarantee, and that is long-term debt. It does not say in here that the Government of Canada can relax; that there will be no demands made on them in the future for long-term debt support for this company. It does not say that. It talks about equity; it talks about short-term debt; but it says nothing about long-term debt. That is the point that concerns me, because I think this company is going to have a need for long-term money. They are not in this world alone; they are in the world of tough competition; they are in the world of extremely active, aggressive competition and they face other merchants with aircraft to sell which will give the Challenger a run for its money. There is the Falcon 900; there is the Gulfstream IV. These are two of the most prominent aircraft in the market today.

It seems to me—and I put this to the minister in the committee—that in their financing budget, in the cash flow statements they have arranged and in their schedules of what will be needed in the future, they have neglected to make what I think is adequate provision for the possibility—and need I go so far as to say “the probability?”—that they will not be able to coast forever with Challenger 601; that at some time in the not too distant future they will have to produce a new model, a new product; they will have to set up a new production line of aircraft if they are to keep up with the competition that they will meet in this intensive and highly competitive world situation.

I suspect that the omission from this statement of words of assurance with respect to long-term debt was intentional, because the government recognizes that possibility as well as I do. If we think to ourselves that, having disposed of the $1.350 billion of past debt and having granted the $310 million in new money this year, we are out of the woods, I hope that may be so but I must confess that I have real concern that it may not be so when I look at the projections that the company has given us.

Incidentally, in committee I asked for these statements and they miraculously appeared, but they are in such an abbreviated form that it is hard to know what they mean. All I know is that the forecast of sales, which is the touchstone of the whole operation, is quite unusual. The sales are estimated, in the remaining nine months of 1984, to be $247 million. The next year, they jump to $387 million. The year after that, they are projected at $497 million. The following year they are projected at $586 million, and the year after that they are projected at $637 million. I say to you that it is not difficult to draw a graph; it is not hard to make assumptions—although we do not know what those assumptions are; we cannot be told those assumptions because this is a commercial property and, even though the government supplies the money, the public is not supposed to know what the money is required for.

However, common sense tells me, and other honourable senators here, that when you have a forecast that raises the sales from $247 million, in 1984, to $637 million, in 1988, in this kind of business, in this kind of competitive atmosphere, with this aircraft unchanged and unmodified, one has to ask if those figures are really realistic. If they are not realistic, then all this fine talk about not coming back to the government for more money will disappear into thin air.

Perhaps it is again wishful thinking; the triumph of wishful thinking being adopted as a policy over experience is what I think we are seeing in this presentation on behalf of the minister. I say to the house that the assurance that is contained in this document—the general impression being that they will not need any more money from the public purse—is one upon which I, for one, would not care to fully rely. No more short-term guarantees—perhaps; no more equity money—we shall see; but no more long-term money for investment in new plant and equipment for the new models—I think that is highly questionable. I say that when you add those facts, with the curious graph that has been drawn here with respect to sales into the future, one would be justified in thinking that, if not this year, then next year, these same people will be back for more money under the same circumstances. Then we shall see that it is a triumph of wishful thinking over experience which lies behind this material.

I take a very simple view. I say that if things are that rosy and this company will make money in the future without the infusion of any more capital, then is this not a great time to let the private sector have it?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Whom do you suggest? Who wants it?

Senator Roblin: That is the very question. Who wants it? Nobody wants it, and the reason is because they do not believe these figures about profits; they do not believe these figures about sales; they do not believe these figures about no more government money being awarded. That is why they will not buy it. If these facts were really convincing, there might be more than one person who would be inclined to take a chance and buy this company from the government.

Senator Frith: Then what is the alternative?

Senator Roblin: The alternative is just what the minister is going to do—

Senator Frith: Is the alternative to let it go, let it sink, ground it?

Senator Roblin: On the basis of the record of my honourable friend's performance in the last seven years, almost anything else he did with it, except carry on, would be a good thing because all he has done so far is lose $1.350 billion. He could take all the workers in Canadair and send them to Florida for the rest of their lives, with the money being used to pay for this kind of capital investment.

• (2110)

Senator Frith: Is that official Conservative policy?

Senator Roblin: No, it is not and my honourable friend knows that it is not.

Senator Frith: What should be done?

Senator Roblin: When I am sitting in my honourable friend's place, I will fix this company up in no time flat.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At least, don't lie to the Canadian public!

Senator Roblin: I will tell my honourable friend what I would do first. I would level. I would level with the people of Canada. He has not levelled and he is not levelling now. He is not telling us the assumptions on which this document has been put together. He will not tell us.

Senator Flynn: Where is the minister this evening?

Senator Roblin: He should level with the people of Canada. We will level with the people of Canada. When we do, we will find plenty of support for the policies we adopt.

Honourable senators, I cannot prevent this measure from going through. It is probably not the function of the Senate to prevent its going through, in any event, because the Senate is not a confidence body; we have other fish to fry. But I could not let this debate go by without expressing some real concerns on our behalf that if my honourable friends are there—which is a big “if”—if they are there, they will be back for more money before too long.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the particular question of Canadair, it is understandable and, I think, desirable that Senator Roblin and members of the opposition—indeed, any other honourable senators—should raise questions about this complicated and admittedly risky business. The government has levelled—and Senator Austin has levelled throughout—by saying that it involves a risk.

I think, however, that the overall questions are two-fold and simply nothing more than this: First, should anything be done? Should the government do anything to maintain an aircraft industry in Canada, or, because of all the problems outlined and underlined by Senator Roblin and others—huge and complicated problems that exist within the aircraft industry and within Canadair—should the government refrain from doing anything to maintain an aircraft industry? That is the question that faced the government, not on an “if” basis, not on a hypothetical basis, not if, maybe, they, the opposition, were sitting on this side instead of the present government. Just as the opposition has properly taken on its responsibility to raise these questions, the government has had to take the responsibility of deciding, “Shall we or shall we not?”

Honourable senators, it is not a matter of competing with the private sector to take over this industry. It seemed to the government that the implications of letting this industry die, of doing an “Avro” on it, were so widespread that the government had to take some steps. I say to honourable senators that the government has levelled, that the government has said throughout that this is a risky business. The government has outlined the kind of debt that must be written off or the kind of money that is needed to keep the industry going. The government has made it clear that, to make it work, we have to sell the 15 per year.

Senator Flynn: We hope; we hope!

Senator Frith: Of course it is hope. I suppose that, ideally, the government could say that in order to save the Canadian aircraft industry—

Senator Flynn: And in order to save face, too!

Senator Frith:—it must continue subsidizing it. Honourable senators, that occurs in every nation in the world that is involved in the aircraft business. Every government massively subsidizes its aircraft industry.

I repeat that the question facing the government was: Should we get out? Is it too hot in the kitchen? Should we allow the aircraft industry to be no more because it is too costly and too risky a venture? The decision was there to be taken. It is a decision which has certainly been made before—it was made in the case of the Avro “Arrow,” and I am not saying whether it was made rightly or wrongly. Whichever way it turned out, that question was faced by another government and a decision was taken on it.

[Senator Roblin.]

In this case, as well, the government has taken a decision. The government has identified what is involved—all of the technology, all of the jobs, all of the other industries, including those in Winnipeg, that are involved and that face the possibility of dying along with Canadair, because that was the choice. It was, “You steps up and you takes your chances.” If you want to stay in the big, competitive, risky league—that of the countries who have an aircraft business—then you have to do what all of the rest of the players do, that is, subsidize massively that industry and preserve all of the benefits that flow from it.

The decision did not have to be taken in this way, but the first question facing the government was “to do or not do.” And the government has said, “We do.”

Having decided “to do,” the next question was: How to do it? Having decided to stay in the league for all of the ensuing benefits, was it a good idea to write off the debt? Perhaps not, honourable senators, but there was no lack of levelling on this point. The minister made perfectly clear what was to be done and said that that is what he was going to do. Studies and analyses were carried out. The minister has told us that the options that were taken were always the most conservative—if I can be pardoned for what I hope is a desirable adjective—and the projections were made on the basis of a business decision.

What does that mean? It means exactly what Senator Roblin is describing—it means risk. It does not mean guarantees. If the scenario were such that there was an absolute guarantee of no risk in saving Canadair, then the government would never have had to look at the problem.

Honourable senators, those were the questions that faced the government. A decision had to be taken. It may not be the right decision, but I have not heard anyone say, politically, that the alternative was to let it go. Perhaps that is the policy of the official opposition. If it is, then a good argument can be made in support of it. The government considered that argument. The government considered whether it ought to stay in the league and keep Canadair flying or ground it and let it go.

Senator Roblin: It never got off the ground!

Senator Frith: It is easy to criticize; it is easy to say, “I am not telling you what to do. I am simply saying that what you did is not the way to do it.”

Honourable senators, have we heard any other options? Is there an alternative to writing off the debt? Let us hear about it; perhaps there is a better way. Is there an alternative to supplying operating capital to the company? We have not heard of it, if there is.

I repeat that this is serious business but that the government had to make its decision because the stakes do not involve just the amount of money; the stakes include the number of jobs in this and in subsidiary industries; the stakes include all of the technology. As to technology, I would suggest that 50 per cent of all of our technology—whether it be with respect to automobiles, urban transport or whatever—is foreign. Honourable senators, there is nothing unusual about the idea that the technology is not 100 per cent Canadian.

The government has stood up and has made the decision to save Canadair. It has indicated how that will be done. If there should be a lot of questions on how it should be done, we can make a further inquiry. I am sure that the minister is the man to defend all of this in detail.

Honourable senators, I can only say that I have no hesitancy in supporting the decision made by the government, knowing the risks involved in Canada's maintaining an aircraft industry in this very difficult and competitive international league. If we can take it that the opposition agrees that it was a good decision to save Canadair but it wants more detail on the way in which the government plans to do so, answers can be provided by means of inquiry or by means of reference of those questions to committee. The chairman of the committee has already informed us that the minister has offered to reappear before the committee and give more detail. So, honourable senators, that is the government's position on Canadair, and that is why these figures are in the estimates and why they are referred to in the appropriation bill.

Senator Flynn: I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. Each time the government has come to Parliament, it has painted a rosy picture of the future, such as the Deputy Leader of the Government has done today. Was it justified in doing that each time, if it knew that the risk was so high? After all, each time the government has come to Parliament it has lied to the public in order to overcome the hurdle.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition's first question was: In coming to Parliament, did the government paint too rosy a picture? Well, that is a judgmental view. The government has made its analysis. As I have said, it is taking the risk because it believes it has a good chance. If it did not believe it had a good chance, it would not take the risk. Does it have an absolute guarantee? No. Has it ever said that it had a guarantee? No.

Hon. Martial Asselin: The government was wrong; it made a wrong decision.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Is it wrong to keep Canadair operating?

Senator Frith: The government was not wrong in this decision. Am I being asked whether the government has always been right each time it has asked for money? No. I do not know of anyone—

Senator Asselin: The government has been wrong all of the time.

Senator Roblin: The government was wrong in—

Senator Frith: In Senator Roblin's opinion, the government was wrong. But was it wrong to save Canadair, or did it do it the wrong way?

Senator Flynn: The wrong way. It is not frank.

Senator Frith: It is perfectly frank. For a government that has not shared the facts, that has sat on all of the facts, or has not given any facts, it is amazing how Senator Roblin could spend 45 minutes talking about the facts. Where did he get them?

Senator Roblin: I got them before—

Senator Frith: He got them because the government did exactly what the honourable senator said he would do, which is to level. It has furnished all of the facts. It has given the opposition all the ammunition it wanted by giving it all of the facts. If there are more facts to be had, the minister has undertaken to provide them.

Senator Flynn: That is why he is away this evening.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Roblin whether he can, in 45 seconds or 45 minutes, tell us what is the official policy of his party vis-a-vis Canadair.

Senator Olson: He will never answer that.

Senator Roblin: I can answer it. If I were directing the official policy of the party, I could answer my honourable friend. But I can give him my policy. My policy is that I would have run this as a proper business from the beginning. My policy is that I would not have concealed from Parliament, for seven years, what was going on in this company. My policy is that I would have come to Parliament with the money and the problems. Had that been done, either it would have been corrected in good time or we would have seen the error of our ways.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Roblin: If the Deputy Leader of the Government is going to reply to a question—

Senator Asselin: Are you answering a question?

Senator Frith: Let us leave the matter with Senator Roblin's comments on what he would have done.

Senator Flynn: We have helped you.

Senator Frith: You were very helpful; thank you.

Senator Flynn: You were saved by the bell.

Senator Roblin: If you were to speak again, you might not like what I would have to say.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, as no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this order is considered debated.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1983-84

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-27, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March 1984.

He said: Honourable senators, actually there is not much to be added to the report presented by the Chairman of the Committee. Regarding aspects of this Bill that concern appropriations for Canadair, Senator Roblin and myself hope that our discussions on the matter have been adequate.

Honourable senators, the Bill before the Senate today concerns Appropriation Act No. 4, 1983-84, which provides for the release of appropriations for the entire Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1983-84, which were the subject of Senator Doody's report. The last Supplementary Estimates for this year total, as Senator Doody said, approximately $2.4 billion, so that the total 1983-84 estimates tabled to date are $92.7 billion.

Honourable senators, as Senator Doody pointed out, these estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 8, 1984, when they were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The Committee and officials of the Treasury Board met to discuss the estimates on March 15, 1984. The Committee, as honourable senators are aware, presented its report on March 22, 1984. An explanation of the report was given today by the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Doody.

As the senator pointed out, between the items with statutory authority and the new spending authorities, the total of $2.4 billion represents a net increase of $1.1 billion for items with a statutory authority, which is non-discretionary, as Senator Doody said. Furthermore, Parliament has been asked to approve a new spending authority of $1.3 billion. As mentioned in Committee, the increase in requirements as a result of proposed legislation includes the following major items: for health care, payment of the sum of $852 million to the provinces for contributions to health care programs under the Established Programs Financing Act; and for the Canada Post Corporation, the sum of $300 million to be used to cover its operating deficit for 1983-84. That was mentioned by Senator Doody and it had to do with the infrastructure, not the deficit. As to post-secondary education, there is a reference to a $264 million payment to the provinces for post-secondary education. Under railways, payments amounting to $141 million are to be made to the railway companies to offset losses incurred for transporting grain at the Crow's Nest rates. For the Atlantic fisheries, investments of $114 million will be made under the Atlantic Fisheries Restructuring Act. Additional equalization payments of $107 million will be made to certain provinces.

Honourable senators, the new spending authority as recommended covers main items as follows: Concerning Canadair and de Havilland which have just been mentioned, $310 million to Canadair Limited and $240 million to de Havilland of Canada Limited to replenish their capital stock; the Canada Post Corporation will receive $170 million for infrastructure costs; and $130 million for loans to the Northern Canada Power Commission.

As the chairman of the committee pointed out, these supplementary estimates include 32 $1 items. The members of the committee were given the list which contains additional information on the last five items. Those items were discussed with Treasury Board secretariat officials during the committee meeting on March 15, 1984.

Normally, honourable senators, when I introduce the supply bill, I also give the total of supply to date for 1983-84. All appropriations are finalized and Bill No. 4 is usually the last one. I ask that this table be inserted in Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows)

SUPPLY TO DATE FOR 1983-84

Three Appropriation Acts have been approved in respect of Estimates for 1983-84:

Supply Approved to Date

Appropriation Act No. 1, 1983-84 which granted Interim Supply for April, May and June including 31 additional proportions, based on the Main Estimates for 1983-84.	$ 9,328,506,277.74
--	---------------------

Appropriation Act No. 2, 1983-84 which granted Supply for: - the balance of the Main Estimates for 1983-84;                      $23,618,654,033.26 - the whole of Supplementary Estimates (A) for 1983-84.	1,369,452,002.00
	$24,988,106,035.26

Appropriation Act No. 3, 1983-84 which granted Supply for the whole of Supplementary Estimates (B) for 1983-84.	$ 1,815,817,064.00
--	---------------------

Total	$36,132,429,377.00
-------	---------------------

Awaiting Approval

Supply for the whole of Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1983-84.	$ 1,370,654,090.00
Total	$37,503,083,467.00

Less $225,000 in National Revenue vote 1C (Customs and Excise) disallowed by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Martial Asselin: By how much will this increase the deficit?

Senator Frith: The estimates tabled for 1983-84 provide for a total amount of $92.7 billion. The figures I have are for the piece of legislation are included in the votes and in the committee report. As you agreed, honourable senators, I have included these details in my speech.

Honourable senators, I urge you to support this Bill at the second reading stage.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have tried to listen carefully to Senator Frith's explanations concerning the amounts provided, especially in the case of Canada Post. I wonder whether he could provide us with detailed explanations—I may have misunderstood—about the $15 million item mentioned by Senator Doody as the Treasury Board officials were not able to give us any information about this amount.

I may have misunderstood Senator Frith; if that is the case, I wonder whether he could explain.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the only detail I have comes under the heading of infrastructure costs. This is not exactly part of the deficit, but it is the only detail I have. Usually, this information is provided to the committee, as Senator Guay has explained.

As I understand the committee chairman's comments the committee requested details about the $300 million in the deficit. This question was not raised by Senator Doody, but the other point was the $170 million.

If I understood him correctly, Senator Doody said that he asked for detailed information about the corporation; normally, Treasury Board officials are willing to provide us with this information, but they did promise to do so later.

Senator Guay: In that case, honourable senators, they will give him the details?

Senator Frith: We did ask for them.

Senator Guay: They will provide the details later on. In this particular case, I would like to have information about the $50 million mentioned by Senator Doody in connection with cultural affairs.

● (2130)

[English]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I do not have the facts before me, but I recall the question being posed before the committee to witnesses from Treasury Board and I recall the $170 million. As it was explained to us in committee, there are two items. One is culture related, in that the Government of Canada subsidized the Post Office to perform some cultural printing and mailing. The other item deals with a program which the Post Office is carrying on for Treasury Board.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I should like Senator Frith to tell me something. When our committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology dealt with Bill C-3, we realized that some of its provisions meant to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act which deals with post-secondary education financing and insured health service programs.

To help us understand the impact of Bill C-3 on the Federal Government's contributions, would Senator Frith tell us whether the figures he quoted a while ago take into account the fact that Bill C-3 will certainly be adopted and shall be deemed to have come into force on April 1, 1984, as provided under Section 33, even if it should come into force at a later date, or whether it is based on the current fiscal arrangements regarding post-secondary education and health services?

Which would prompt a supplementary question: What is the impact of Bill C-3 on the estimates for health programs? Will it keep them as they are now, or increase or decrease them?
